We regret to state, says the Wexford Independent, that an accident occurred to young Messrs. Timpson and Jefferies—sons of two of our most respectable citizens—from the imprudent use of fire-arms, of a very serious character. They were proceeding up river, accompanied by other young persons, in a boat towards Ferrycarrig, and had just reached the Point of Park, when Mr. Jefferies took up a gun to fire at a water-fowl, which burst in the act of being discharged, breaking the index finger of his left hand in two places, and laying open the cheek, breaking some of the teeth, and inflicting a wound in the head of Mr. Timpson, who was sitting by his side. No serious consequence is apprehended to Mr. Jefferies, and it is hoped that Mr. Timpson will also ultimately recover.

We have just learned, says the Galway Mercury, that Mr. R. L. Johnson, of 48 Mary-street, had the shop windows of that establishment brilliantly lighted with peat gas on several nights during the week, and that this illuminating agent far surpassed in beauty and cleanliness the coal gas. Any private house requiring much light, can erect its own machinery at a comparatively small outlay. A street can join, and supply their locality at a nominal cost. One sod of hard turf will yield a supply of beautiful gas for two hours, superior in every respect to that of imported coal. There is no disagreeable odor, and this is a great advantage.

We perceive by recently published agricultural statistics, that in 1856, in the county of Waterford, there were grown there, 26,200 acres of wheat; 30,862 of oats; 7,368 of barley, bere, rye, peas and beans; 19,946 of potatoes; 12,150 of turnips; 3,496 of other green crops; 49 of flax; 17,304 of meadow and clover, showing a total of 117,184 acres under cultivation. There was an increase in the acreage under every crop except barley, bere, rye, beans, and peas, in which there is a falling off of 3,103 acres. The increase in the acreage of potatoes, is 1,100.

The Waterford News reports that while the schooner Edmond Jones was on her voyage from Cardiff to that port, and off Connibig light-ship, it blowing a gale at the time, the boom-guy parted, and the boom coming aboard, struck the captain and knocked him over into the angry sea. The captain, fortunately, caught the reef pennant, which was hanging in the water; but the vessel was driving so fast before the wind, that he was unable to get on board until the crew had succeeded in bringing the vessel by the wind and throwing him a strong rope, by which means his life was saved, after having been half an hour in the water.

The Limerick Observer informs us that on the 2d ult., at the petty sessions of Tomglony, a mill owner was fined, at the prosecution of Mr. Alton, for having a net set in one of the watercourses of his mill. Although it appeared that the defendant was in Dublin at the time the offence was committed, yet this plea did not avail, as mill-owners are liable to the consequences of any breaches of the fishery laws which may occur in the neighborhood of their premises—no matter who the actual offender may be.

On the 23d ult., a respectable farmer, named Simon Breen, and his wife, went to Kilrush market from the parish of Kilmichael, with a car-load of corn. On their return home, about 7 o'clock in the evening, the cart was upset on the road-side, when Breen and his wife were thrown under the cart and killed. Another party returning home, found Breen and his wife quite dead under the cart.

The Wexford Independent reports that on the 23d ult., a fine vessel called the Sphynx, struck on that unlucky shoal—the Blackwater Bank—where, in all probability, she would have become a total wreck, only that the Glasgow tug-boat, which had been fortunately engaged at the time, saving the cargo of the Irrawaddy, at Cahore, proceeded to her assistance, and succeeded in towing her into deep water.

We (Derry Journal) are gratified to learn that Mr. Sherrard, a respectable merchant of Derry, who had lately to pay an excise penalty, under circumstances of extreme hardship, the fault having been entirely that of a Liverpool manufacturer, in whom Mr. Sherrard naturally reposed confidence, from the high character of his establishment, has recovered full compensation from this manufacturer for the loss and expense to which he had been put.

At the Bulmullet Quarter Sessions, an application was made at the suit of the Marquis of Sligo, the Earl of Lucan, and others, against the Protestant Archbishop of Tuam and the Ecclesiastical Commissions, to vary the tithe redt-charge. Mr. Buchanan, for the appellants, said he had applied to the court to appoint an arbitration to ascertain the average price of oats for the seven years preceding, in order that the tithe rent-charge payable in lieu of compensation for tithes in the parish of Aughavale, Kilgeever, and Aughagower, might be diminished. Having detailed the procoeding required by the statutes, and stated that the average price of oats, when the composition was made, was 15s. 2d. per barrel; and that the average for the last seven years was expected to be 12s. 6d., making a difference against the tithe-owners, and in favor of the tithe-payers of 14 to 17 per cent., proceeded with the necessary proofs. The court made the order accordingly, and by consent, the Clerk of the Peace (who was solicited by both parties to act) was appointed arbitrator to make his return at Westport Quarter Sessions. Similiar proofs were giveu as to the parishes, and the proceedings so far terminated. This was the first successful application in this county; a similar one some years ago failed, by the average price being two and a half higher than would affect the existing rent-charge.

The Dublin Evening Packet, a tory journal, publishes the following particulaas of an attack upon the police; but the Nation says that it requires confirmation. We should think so. It bears the mark of improbability on the face of it:—

"About ten o'clock on Sunday night last, (the 26th ult.) Constable Phillips and seven of the Ballymahon constabulary were on patrol at Moigh, where they discovered an armed party, consisting of over two hundred persons, who appeared to be in council on the road. The Constabulary crouched under the hedge, and crept along unobserved until within a few yards of the party, and then went forward and demanded their intentions. At this time one of the party, who appeared to be their leader, called out to his men to fall in and front, which was promptly obeyed, when they rushed forward and endeavored to disarm the police.

At this moment a fearful collision took place. Several of the mob were knocked down, and the constable succeeded in capturing a gun from one of the party after much difficulty. The policeman almost lost his carbine, it having been seized by five or six of the mob; but the bold and determined resistance of the police, who had their belts torn off in the struggle, caused their assailants to give way for a moment. Again the mob made a fearful attack on the police (who had loaded and fixed bayonets), endeavoring to regain the captured gun. The road was well contested for nearly a mile by the small but gallant Constabulary party and their numerous assailants; the snapping of the fire-arms was quite audible, and stones were showered as hail.

The police succeeded at last in arresting seven of the party, all natives of the county Westmeath, some of whom had come upwards of fifteen miles. Informations have been sworn against the parties, who are returned for trial to the next assizes at Longford.

At the Bandon Sessions, Mr. D. Connor, J.P., made his second or third endeavor to deprive a man named Crowley, of his spirit license. Mr. Conner's hostility was provoked, it appears, in the following manner:—Crowley had been strongly solicited for his vote, when Mr. Frewen was a candidate for the county, and had refused, and ever since he got no peace. Mr. Conner, of Mauch, it appears, wrote him a note, which has been preserved as evidence of the influence brought to bear on him. On the next occasion that the new law presented an opportunity, an attempt was made to deprive him of his license. The attempt, however, was defeated.

In reference to the statement which appeared in our last, says the Ulsterman, that the Rev. Mr. O'Kane, of Downpatrick, had been fired at while retutning from a sick call, at night, we have seen a communication from the respected young priest himself, in which he states that our correspondent was misinformed. Father O'Kane says he was returning from a sick call, when he encountered a nnmber of Orangemen on a car, who were coming from the Quarter Sessions. They were noisy and "jolly," and one of them fired off his pistol. But Father O'Kane says he had no reoson to suppose that the pistol was fired at him. And he adds, that he has, often and often, been out late at night on sick calls, and never yet met with molestation from anybody.

A letter has been received by the Town Clerk of Cork, from the Crown Solicitor, calling attention to the fact that the corporation have omitted to levy three half yearly instalments of ministers' money for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and intimating that an information would be exhibited in the Court of Exchequer against the corporation on the first day of next term (3d November), at the suit of the Crown, unless the demand be forthwith paid.

A deputation of the following Foremen Millers, including some of the Engineers.—Richard Luther, Robert Lynn, Patrick Flanaghan, Wm. Conway, John Cooney, William Dwan, and Richard Comerford, waited on the merchants and mill proprietors of Clonmel, Messrs. Wm. Davis, Thomas and Abraham Murray, Thomas Samuel Grubb and Sons, Thomas Hughes, and Sons, and Pim Brothers, who, in the most humane and praiseworthy manner, abridged the hours of labor from 7 to 7 in winter, and from 6 to 6 in summer.

On the night of the 24th ult., the shop of Miss Ryan, Queen-street, Nenagh, was entered by burglars, and some groceries taken away. It was fortunate that the same evening she removed a tin box from the shop where there was a good deal of cash deposited, as the object of the burglars was evidently to take away the box which they must have previously set their eyes on. On the same night the house of Michael Guilfoye, of Silver-street, was entered by a back window, and some property taken away.

A porter, named Dwyer, met with a melancholy death at Dundrum station on the Great Southern and Western Railway, on the 23rd ult. He was in the act of crossing the line when the up train from Cork passed over his body, mangling him in a most horrible manner.

The mill owners of Belfast are adopting the weekly-payment system to their workers.

A considerable number of shares in the Kilrush and Kilkee Railway Company have been taken.

The young men of Belfast have established a literary and debating society in that town.

The cattle trade between Wexford and Liverpool, is rapidly increasing.

Thomas Gallway, of Killarney, agent to Lord Kerware, has had a narrow escape from death, by brain fever.

We are informed, says the Dublin Tablet, by a correspondent that the claim to the Earldoms of Shrewsbury, Wexford, and Waterford, which our readers are aware, is about to be preferred by Major William Talbot, of Castle Talbot, in the county of Wexford (brother of the late estimable countess), has been formally lodged with the Secretary of State, to be laid, in due course before her Majesty. The pedigree has been made out, and traced through six intermediate generations, down to Major Talbot, by Sir Bernard Burke, Ulster King of Arms, with the help of a barrister who has gained considerable experience of peerage cases. The common ancestor between Bertram, the last earl, and Major Talbot, is found in John, tenth earl, who died in 1653, and who left, says Burke, with other issue, an eldest surviving son, Francis, who succeeded as eleventh earl, and a son, Gilbert, throngh whom the title descended to Gilbert, thirteenth earl, who, it will be remembered, was a Priest of the Catholic Church. It is among the "other issue" mentioned here that Major Talboi claims to have found an immediate ancestor; and if this descent be formally established when the matter come before a Committee of Prileges in the House of Lords, on the meeting of Parliament, the claim of Lord Talbot of Ingestre, we presume, will not have to be entered upon at all, inasmuch as his lordship does not pretend to be descended from a common ancestor with the late earl later than John, the secodd earl, who fell at the battle of Northumberland in 1460, present to lay the pedigree before our readers in an extended form, but we hope to be able to do so shortly. Major Talbot is the only surviving son of the late Matthew Talbot, Esq., of Ballynamony (now called Castle Talbot), county Wexford, by his second wife, Jane, Countess of D'Arcy. He was born about the year 1790, and is unmarried. In event of his succeeding in establishing his claim to the peerage, his next brother and heir presumptive is Mr. John Hyacinth Talbot, of Ballytrent House, county Wexford, who sat in parliament for many years as the representative of New Ross, and is a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for his native county. He was born in 1794, and married first, in 1822, Anne Eliza, only daughter and heir of the late Walter Redmond, Esq., of Ballytrent House, a banker in the town of Wexford, who died in 1826, leaving him three daughters, who are now Lady Power, Lady Redington, and Mrs. O'Neill Segreave. He married secondly, in 1852, Elizabeth, daughter of the late Sir John Power, Bart., of Roebuck House, county Dublin, by whom he has issue a daughter Emily, a son, John Hyacinth, in whom the earldom will eventually vest, in event of Major Talbot's claim being admitted as established by the House of Lords.

Protestant proscription is not yet extinct in Ireland, but it is on its last legs. The enlightenment of the age threatens to disturb its banquet on the loaves and fishes. At a meeting of the Dublin Protestant Association, held on the 19th ult., the following resolutions were adopted:—"That desiderating as we do national righteousness as the keystone to national prosperity, we are thoroughly persuaded that without a National Church, in which the pure Word of God is taught and promulgated, and His sacraments rightly administered, with its lights standing on the hill of nationality, trimmed and protected by the State, the Church in return rectifying that which may be inclining to evil in the State, this or any other nation never can attain to the Scriptural ideal of a righteous nation. That we view with contempt and indignation the sinister efforts of those in England who, enjoying the liberty and toleration procured for them by the Church of England, have leagued themselves with the Irish Papists in order to effect the overthrow the Irish branch of the National Church, and with it their own liberties. That we look upon them as religious, political, and social suicides, unfit to be trusted with their own liberties; and, therefore, we call upon all our Protestant members of Parliament with the firmest indignation to scout from the House of Commons any attempt to be made to re-open the question of the settlement of the Church as by law established; and we earnestly request every Protestant constituency to press this view of the questton on their representatives, to the end that libertinism in matters of religion. and revolution in matters political, may be prevented."

The Right Rev. Dr. Moriarty (Kerry), and the Right Rev. Dr. Walsh (Ossory), have affiliated to the Catholic University, the schools in Tralee and Kilkenny which are under their care—namely, the St. Mary's Grammar School in Tralee, and the Seminary in Kilkenny. According to the regulations of the University, Grammar Schools, which come up to a certain standard, may be affiliated, at the recommendation of their respective Diocesans, on the conditions that they are to be subject to formal inspection, and that the pupils are to be examined once a year by persons deputed by the university. To each of the affiliated schools a prize will be given by the University to the pupil who acquits himself best in the examination; and a certain number of full Burses, lasting during the four first years of residence in the University, are offered annually to the competition of the pupils of Affiliated Schools, who are over sixteen years of age.

We understand, says the Waterford Independent, that several of the Arklow men, charged with having taken an active part in plundering the wreck of the Irrareaddy, at Cahore, as mentioned in our last publication, have been arrested, and informations sworn against them. Ten arrived on Thursday at the goal under a strong escort of police, and two more in the evening were brought in and committed by Mr. Greene, J. P., also charged as participating in the plunder. Several men in order to avoid being captured, abandoned their boats and took to the hills, whilst others put to sea and have not yet landed. There can be no doubt that many more will be made amirble to justice in a short time, as their names and persons are known.

In addition to the complimentary address from the inhabitants of the town and district of Fermoy, to Mr. John Bourke Curtayne, on the occasion of his retirement from the Provincial Bank, preparatory to his acceptance of an engagement abroad, the many private friends of that gentleman presented him with a handsome and valuable gift, as a token of their esteem.

The Cork Examiner states that the Cork Police Office has been long a disgrace to the city. It is unwholesome, inconveniently placed, and totally destitute of the requisite accommodation for magistrates, solicitors, press, police, criminals, spectators, or in fact any one class of the numbers who choke it up on any occasion of the least excitement.

Mr. Thomas Price, proprietor of the Carlow Post, while returning from Baltinglass, had his leg broken at the ankle, and sustained several other severe injuries, by the horse running away and dashing the car against a large stone at the angle of a road.

Sir Thomas Esmonde, Johnstown Castle, has given £10 towards the repairs of the Wexford Franciscan church.

A short time since, a private at the Fermoy barracks absconded, taking with him £50 belonging to his officer.

Mr. Edmond Burke, of Charlotte's Quoy, Limerick, has in his possession one of those rare and valuable coins — a Queen Anne's farthing, which was found in the county Galway, about a fortnight ago, and which is in the best preservation. The obverse has the head and bust of the Queen—the reverse the Royal Arms, as in the modern florin, with the date 1711.

At Miltown Malbay Petty Sessions on the 16th ult., Dr Geo. Wolfe was, at the prosecution of the Apothecaries Hall, bound over to take his trial at the next assizes of Ennis on a charge of acting as an apothecary without being duly licensed to do so by the hall.

At the Curraghmore horse-sale the entire value of the stood offered for competition by the Marquis of Waterford was over £9,000. Those sold were — 30 Sires and Hunters for £2148 19s; 11 two years old, £263 10s. 6d.; 18 yearlings, £1490; 11 brood mares, £266. Total £5068 9s.

In Cork, on the 22d ult., Mr. Russell D. Connell was charged with larceny and embezzlement of money the property of the Cork Charitable Loan Bank, in which bank he had been a clerk. The magistrates granted information, but took bail, himself in £200, and two sureties in £150 each.

A farmer named James M'Cullagh, residing at Lurgan Green, committed suicide by hanging himself in his own stable, on the 23d ult.. He was formerly in the employment of Lord Claremont, as baliff. Domestic troubles and drink impelled him to the frantic and criminal act.

It is stated that Sir John W. Ramsden will retire from the representation of Taunton and become the member for Huddersfield, nearly the whole of which town belongs to the honorable baronet.

In Derry, the building of the Magee (Presbyterian) College is already far advanced. The walls are now six or seven feet high above the ground, and give earnest of an extensive and elegant structure. The material of which the College is being built, is Scotch sandstone.

The Picture Window in the Down Catholic cathedral was fired into on Monday night, 20 ult., and the damage done to it is much greater than that inflicted by the stone throwers of the preceding week.

A fight recently occurred in Kinvala, county Galway, and one of the parties engaged was so severely injured that he died soon afterwards.

One of the Irish railway officers, whose name is not given, has absconded, taking with him a sum of money belonging to the company.

Mr. George, one of the members for the county Wexford, is making exertions to have a life-boat and carriage placed at Copore, on the Wexford coast.

At the petty sessions of Kilmallock, John Toomey and Thos. Finn were convicted at the prosecution of Mr. Alton, for fishing in the close season, and fined 10s. each.

There was not a single crown case at the Dingle Quarter Sessions.

Capt. Harvey offers to subscribe £1,000 to aid the formation of a railway between Wexford and Enniscorthy.

Mr. Newry has been elected Coroner for the Ardel district of the county Lowth, in opposition to Dr. Verdon.

The Right Hon. Judge Keogh has been on a visit at Drumcondra, the seat of Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Bart., Q. C.

Constabulary for the protection of Clonmel at night have been sent to that town from Dublin.

The magistrates of Bannagher district have applied to the Inspector-General to allow Head Constable Companion to remain at Bannagher.

Mr. Roe, County Inspector, is about to retire on pension.

The Constabulary of the city and county of Waterford have contributed £13 14s. 7d. towards the same object.

Correspondence.

Kilkenny Letter.

KILKENNY, October 30, 1856.

Both you and your correspondent, "THE METAL-MAN," have said that Waterford never changes. So, too, might I say about Kilkenny. 'Tis wonderful how stationary things and people are amongst us these five or six years past. The same streets, the same houses—aye, the very same names over the shop doors. Doubtless, many of your readers may think this odd—for when we are removed from friends and places and things we love, we imagine they must be changing. But 'tis not so. I repeat what you said of Waterford, Kilkenny never changes!

Those remorseless scissors of yours—so exacting in hunting out every item of news from your exchanges (what a holy show you must make of them)—rarely leave anything for us poor correspondents to relate. So you must not wonder if I sometimes send the same as you get from our local prints.

I am sorry to have to say we are about losing our editor, Mr. Doyle, who has so ably and faithfully conducted the Journal during the past year. He is bound for Australia. I send you his "Farewell," which I consider fully and truthfully bears out the patriotic fidelity for which I have more than once given him credit.

"A FEW WORDS OF FAREWELL.

"DUBLIN, Friday.

"It has become my painful duty to bid farewell to the readers of the Kilkenny Journal. For nearly twelve months I have had the honor of conducting their local organ of public opinion; and I now retire from its guardianship because I am retiring from Ireland altogether. Weary of a political atmosphere, which has at last become almost thoroughly tainted by English influence, I am on the eve of a voyage to Australia, where I can preserve a pure conscience, and perhaps secure a prosperous career.

"I trust I have fulfilled all my engagements satisfactorily. I have certainly labored with genuine sincerity and zeal. To promote the interests of the Church and the cause of Irish Independence, I have never omitted an exertion since I first lifted a pen in the fair city of the Nore.

"I shall never forget the kindness which I have received from the generous people of the noble county of Kilkenny; and its glorious scenery will be one of the most delightful reminiscences when I shall be fifteen thousand miles away. I could not trust myself to speak of the respect and affection with which the Catholic Clergy in particular have inspired me; and there are two or three lay friends, whose genius and generous hearts I can never, never forget.

"With these few friends I bid farewell to Kilkenny.

"JAMES DOYLE."

May he be more successful in his new home than he has been in this which he loved so fondly—if not wisely.

The collections for the completion of our new Cathedral have exceeded all our most sanguine expectations. It's another of the many proofs of how our people love their old religion. They may indeed be justly proud of this noble edifice. It's a splendid structure, of unrivalled beauty and elaborate decoration, offering to the eye at every point a lightness of finish of pinacle and of tracery—only equalled by the columned aisles and hues of varied dye, which the rich stained glass windows fling in golden carpeting along the floors of the interior. The flooring is to be of marble and Portland stone, set in compartments, to work out a regular design, with a passage from the great door in the end of the nave to the altar of encaustic tiles. The floor is now the only delay to retard the solemn opening. Everything else is ready. The altars, vestments, thuribles, &c., have all been purchased in Rome. So the great work draws to a close. May the mighty Bishop (Kinsella), who conceived and inaugurated its erection, be now enjoying an eternal repose!

Our Quarter Sessions have just gone by. As has been the case during the past fifteen years, they were presided over by Nicholas Purcell O'Gorman, Esq. Of course you know him. He's a patriot of long standing—one of those who struggled earnestly with the old Catholic Association for the emancipation of his co-religionists. True, he did not belong to the Old or Young Ireland parties; yet he has always proved himself a zealous upholder of religious liberty. I believe his standing aloof from the late national movements may be traced to the charges made against him by Shiel and O'Connell, for the abstraction of certain documents belonging to the Association. However, he never denied having taken them. On the contrary, I believe he claimed them as his own, and I heard him boast of having bullied O'Connell, whom he said—"stoodied at St. Omars!" As to his taking office—so, too, did Shiel, and many of Dan's own boys. His worship is, however, a mighty droll looking specimen of legal jurisprudence. He's an ugly looking man even when he desires to be courteous and look most blandly; but when he opens his jaws to imbibe strawberries and cream, his plethoric countenance becomes awful. He complimented the Grand Jury on the peaceful state of our county—sentenced several miscreants for cow-stealing, hen-stealing, clothes-stealing, &c., and vanished from the City of the Nore!

On the 24th inst., the first regular meeting of the Kilkenny Hounds took place at the CLUB HOUSE, in Patrick street. It far surpassed what we have had of late years. In point of eclât, it nearly came up to those bright old times which our city knew long ago, and to which I reverted in my last letter. Then it was that silver goblets sparkled with bright wine, and pantries and larders were savory and odoriferous with the fat of the land; and the far-famed "Hole-in-the-Wall" was the scene of so much mirth and joviality. The Hounds are now under the management of Lord St. Lawrence, son of the Earl of Howth. The admirable condition of the men, horses and dogs, augur well for the winter's sport. 'Twas a sight far more precious to my vision than all the military displays which could be held, either on the Curragh or in Phœnix Park, till Doomsday. The hearty, vigorous aspect of the men, all determined on enjoying the manly sport of the day; the impetuous ardor—denoted by flashing eye and airy motion—with which the trained old hunter followed the dogs to the covert, told me what I so often felt, that man and horse, with one guileless heart, go bounding along through the bracing breeze, after the sweetest of music—the baying of a noble pack of Fox-hounds. Among the crowd of gentry who turned out, with their bright scarlet coats and well-appointed knee-breeches and top-boots, I was delighted to perceive some of the old stock. Sir John Power, and Captain Ponsonby (a true lover of a good cigar), and John Wade, and Clayton Savage, and Horace Rochfort—a determined soul, long regarded as one of the foremost riders—were all there. A ballad written by Theophilus St. George, characterizing the most prominent riders, portrayed Rochfort as calling out to his horse—"No balking for me, take your leap and be d——d!"

Some other time I'll give you a more lengthy sketch of the celebrities immortalized in this ballad. Other reminiscences also, there are concerning the CLUB, which whenever my news items run short you must have.

I like to have something good to say of my fellow-citizens, and just now an organization has sprung up from which I anticipate the best results. I allude to the establishment of "The Young Men's Society." They have submitted their rules to the Bishop, who has not only approved of them, but invoked blessings on their heads, and promised to assist them in every way, whilst they continued to act in accordance with the rules they submitted to him. The objects of the founders of the Association are truly noble. They mean to inculcate among the fellow-citizens no sectional animosities, but true charity, and a due appreciation of pure literature—a love for the sublime and the beautiful—which, whilst it teaches that Kilkenny should not forget the great names which she has given to the world—Berkley, Bushe, McNevin, and, perhaps, even your own St. Canice (don't laugh,)—will surely prove to a rising generation that Heaven did not decree Ireland should for ever be the draw-farm of England. High honor to our present Mayor, William Lannigan, for his share of this good work.

Now you must be tired of

ST. CANICE.

CORK, 10th October, 1856.

I have just spent two months in Ireland, and I cannot resist the the temptation of giving you my opinion on all I saw during my ramble, which extended from Dublin to Cork, and down to the city which had the honor of giving you birth. You are aware that I have lived entirely abroad for the last twenty-five years, and you know, I believe, that my love for the old country is as warm and deep as when I left it in my schoolboy days; and purer, perhaps, than if I had lived in it during that quarter of a century of sorrow and misery. My ideas will no doubt on many things be those of a foreigner; but my feelings are those of a patriot, and a disinterested one, too—for under the present régime, or any régime except a Home-government, I would not live for millions in that land of slaves. Although I have wandered from North to South, and seen many a spot sacred and dear to you, I have no intention of inflicting on you a description of the beauties which nature has lavished on our poor country, and which would fall far short of the brilliant souvenir they have left on your sensitive and poetical mind. Besides, these glorious treasures of our dear home have caused me more grief than pleasure—more humiliation than pride; for beside the noble mountain, along the fertile valley, and close by the stately mansion, I saw the roofless and tenantless huts, and the mud cottage—I saw barefooted women, and half naked children—I saw rags, misery and hunger. I felt that even now that the country has been blessed with a rich and plentiful harvest, that the population is reduced to half what it ought to be, and that this poor island, our home, is the worst governed, the most wretched and degraded country in the world. I have stood up for it abroad. I have defended our honor and not disgraced it when called on to act the part of a citizen or a soldier; but entre nous, I feel scarcely courage enough now to stand up in defence of such a land of willing slaves. I hope sincerely I may be mistaken, for my heart bleeds at the thought; but from all I have seen and heard, I consider the poor peasant the only representative of the Irish character which, like the language of the country, is becoming obsolete.

With a few consoling and honorable exceptions, I scarcely met a sincere and disinterested patriot among what might be called the respectable portion of the population. All national feeling apart even from political creeds, seems to be dead.

To begin with the Capital and the Dublinois, as the French call the inhabitants of that Ville endormie et endormente, as a visitor lately termed it. The city looks dark and gloomy. There is no stir in the streets—no activity, no movement of business. The very horses seem to move more slowly, and to have lost their spirit too, and the vessels lie lazily on the water. There are large and splendid shops, but beside them there are tenantless houses. At the corner of the principal streets groups of men and women in tattered garments seem waiting for charity or for some chance occupation. The very policemen have a desœuvré air, and seem to have nothing to do.

The comfortable and fashionable part of the population seem to have undergone a complete metamorphosis in their efforts to become West Britons. The men are stiff and pompous. The women gauche and slovenly. Dress, though the study of their lives, and evidently for both sexes extravagant in texture, is tasteless and shapeless. There is a stupid uniformity of costume, originating in the slavery of imitation. Of the beauty of the women I can say little, as they have, in imitation of the English, disguised themselves with large straw or velvet hats, with demi veils, which hide their faces. These frightfully ugly things look like south-westerns, and entirely hide the features thus masked.

From what I could learn there is a progressive kind of Flunkeyism, which extends from the very humblest individual to the highest—from the Gamin in the streets to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant. I traced the filiari in this way, passing no doubt many grades.

The friends, attachés and employés of this noble fonctionaire, the Lord Lieutenant, seem to consider it their right to snub the sprigs of nobility and aristocratic Cawtholics of Irish birth, who in their turn consider it their privilege to look down on mere country-gentlemen; and these clownish rustics, with an increased disdain, spurn professional gentlemen and retired merchants aspiring to mix (that is the word) with them; and these in their turn, after being snubbed by the said rustics, step out themselves (particularly if they keep a carriage or a yacht) and forgetting their own origin—and the origin of their fortunes—look with contempt on the Bout quier, who paid them their fees and made their fortunes, and so on down to my friend the Gamin.

The Castle (the Tuilleries of Dublin) is the great aim of every class in society, and there are no "platitudes" that they do not commit, to get inside the walls of that prison-like Museum.

The beau ideal of the ladies' ambition is officers' society, and of late they have had them cheap enough. The briefless lawyer, the patientless doctor, and other idlers, having got commissions either in the great militia or in the grande armée. Gray-headed ensigns and lieutenants, who, in their black gowns or black coats, would not be looked at, find favor now with the ladies, and by them are transformed into heroes. But, apropos of heroes, we had a great meeting here in Dublin to give a great dinner to the heroes of the said grande armée. The speeches were numerous and long. The author of "The Lays of the War" made one, and he was applauded, it is said, by some of the very identical soldiers who took him to prison between their bayonets in 1848! They then looked upon him as a madman—and such he thinks he was, I suppose, to-day. He has been just appointed to some commission in Lunacy, with £800 a year, by the Government he was then conspiring against, and which he must consider mad, for giving so much to a man from whom they had nothing to fear and little to hope.

I wonder does he ever sing for friend Keogh and his Sadleirite companions—

"Oh, trust me, 'tis churlish and silly,
To ask how the bumpers filled up;
If the tide in the heart be not chilly,
What matters the tide in the cup!
Oh, ne'er may that heart's tide, ascending,
In shame on our foreheads be seen,
While it nobly can ebb in defending
Our own glorious color—the Green!

M. J. B., 1848. Songs of the Nation.

With the exception of the above great demonstration, and a sham fight outside Kingston harbor—in which his Excellency displayed great skill and courage—there was no public exhibition worth mentioning.

I was near forgetting the Flower Show at Salt Hill, at which the aristocratic part of the population and some of the Cawtholics figured; very few of the latter, however, were invited, admitted, or present at the dinner. His Excellency made a great speech on the colors, shades, and perfumes of flowers. He obtained a prize for some unknown specimen of some unknown flower, on which the author of "The Lays" will no doubt write a sonnet. I was shown several celebrities—judges, lawyers, doctors, and poets, and had the honor of seeing for the first time in my life, the illustrious Captain John, of whom I had read and heard so much. I was disappointed in the martial appearance of the ex-hero of Conciliation Hall. He is the leader of the Cawtholics now. Heaven knows to what next he will turn his hand!

One feature that struck me forcibly, as a proof of the want of spirit of the people, is the insulting and bigotted language placarded about the streets, against the religion of the majority of the nation. Allow me to give you verbatim part of one I copied, and which still hangs out in Sackville street:

"Proclamation
"To the Roman Catholics of Ireland. Whereas:
"It having been affirmed and proved again and again by Protestants, that the following articles in your creed are novelties in Religion, and unknown to the first early Fathers of the Church, and not found in the bible, namely:
"1. Invocation of Saints.
"2. Worship of Images.
"3. Auricular Confession.
"4. Extreme Unction."

Twenty-five different other errors follow, and an invitation to the people to abjure these deadly errors.

In no country in the world, except Ireland, would such insult be put up with, even by a minority professing the religion thus reviled!

To return, Dublin is the fountain-head—the very focus of flunkeyism. In every class of society there is the most absurd and ridiculous singerie of high life. I saw many a type of Moliere's bourgeoise gentilhomme, among the parvenus; pompous ignorance glossed over by affectation; clownish manners enlivened only by purse-proud assurance and impudence. The very accent is two-fold; a neglige brogue for every day use, and an Englified genteel one for high people and great days.

Now for the South, where the hearts are warmer and where there is less mannerism and affectation, and far more intellect and genius. Cork—the beautiful city, as its inhabitants call it—looks less dull and gloomy than the capital, although some parts of the suburbs are miserable, and even in some of the best streets are houses that have been tenantless for years; still, there is a stir, a look of business about the place; the shops are not empty, and the quays are alive with business and activity. There is, perhaps, more apparent poverty, but it is of a less degraded and digusting nature. Even the beggars look more intelligent and eveille than those I saw in Dublin; they seem to have the consciousness of their degradation, and a vague sort of conviction that it is not all their own fault. Your hear less of those humble, supplicating sentences: "Throw us a penny, your honor," "Throw us the but [of the cigar], captain," &c. They give you a blessing, which often—if not paid for—they change into a curse.

The hospitality of the Cork people, which is of the most genuine and disinterested nature, gave me many opportunities of judging them, and I must do them the justice to say that, as far as comparison goes, I think both the men and women are far superior in intellect, in education and taste, to their countrymen in the North. In literature, art and science, and above all in wit, they surpass them. The narrow forehead, the small cunning-looking features, and compressed brain, you rarely see here. Nature has nowhere, I believe, been more lavish in her distribution of the treasures of the mind. What a pity, that with such noble faculties, the majority of the well-informed part of the population are devoid of every sentiment of nationality, and are mere scoffers of patriotism. They differ from their brothers in the North only in not becoming such slavish imitators of their masters. How often have I, when admiring this treasure of learning and science, when contemplating the productions of genius, when listening to their original wit, felt sick at heart to think that such souls, such brilliant intellects, have never felt or feel no more that deep spell, that thrilling and ennobling sentiment, that amour sacre de la patrie, which exile, oppression and despair have not extinguished in the patriots of other countries.

The old generation of rheumatic politicians, gray-headed magistrates, knighted mediocrities, and enriched parvenus, the great heroes of Emancipation, Repeal, and other humbugs, are gradually disappearing, however, and are only tolerated and valued for their antiquity—a new and I trust a more useful set of men are coming forward. Too sceptical, perhaps, and wanting in enthusiasm, but less empty in brain. Men who have not passed their lives entirely at home, but who, by comparing their own poor country with others, have learned how backward she is, and how visionary were all the vaunted great things proposed and executed for her prosperity by their fathers. Men who are, at least, practical in their views, and in whom the material prosperity of the country has something to hope, and from whom, when other countries show the example, and break their chains, something may be expected. Politics have not become a gossip or a trade among them, and so far they are superior to their predecessors. Tuft hunting exists, but not to the same degree, as in Dublin, and the ridiculous distinctions between people of different fortunes, or birth, is not so absurd. Genius and talent are passports everywhere, and titled mediocrity meets less adulation here.

There are "coteries," but they are not formed of different classes, but from congeniality of tastes and habits. Jealousies, antipathies, hatred and envy, exist as they do everywhere, and Cork is more "la petch ville de province" than Dublin, but solid acquirements and real talent and worth make up for the inconvenience of gossip and curiosity. There is a little too much ambition to appear above the position people are placed in, and too many are given to show and dress, but it is not flunkeyism—it is a rivalry in elegance and taste.

Unfortunately, the city is losing every day men highly gifted and full of energy and worth. Having no scope for their exertions—feeling that strangers have every position worthy of their talents or ambition, they abandon the land of their birth, to seek a home or a fortune in America or Australia. Except for the base crouching beggars who stoop to the British Government, and belie their past lives and deny their God and their religion, there is little chance of advancement here for the Irish.

The peasantry about Cork are less ignorant and more patriotic than those about Dublin. They have not by any means given up the hope of seeing their country free, and separated from England, and would, if an occasion presented itself, show more energy than their friends in the towns imagine they possess. They are looking more healthy, and have a bold independent manner that contrasts strongly with the stiff Northerns.

But the bell rings, and the train is just going to start for your dear old city, and I must bring my letter to a close. We just got a glimpse of Clonmel, where we stopped for a few minutes. I left a hearty curse with the judges, jury, and Government that, combined together, sent you and your fellow patriots into exile. They dared not send you to the scaffold.

The engine snorted in chorus, and off we fled. The town of the Saddlers is quite deserted, I am told—more than a dozen houses empty in the principal street. But the Jail is standing, and the Court-house open, and both ready to receive and condemn any man daring to say that his country is misruled, or impeach the Government that condemns it to ruin and disgrace.

Waterford is more gloomy than ever. The Quay—the noble Quay—is silent and bare. The houses facing the river are many of them empty, and some fallen into ruin. At sunset you meet no one but policemen, sailors, and a few tattered beggars or applewomen, shivering with cold and hunger. The suburbs are in ruins—houses roofless, others shut up, evidently for years. No stir of business or pleasure. There is more poverty than I ever witnessed before, and the boasted material prosperity of the country has not reached this gloomy and almost abandoned city.

The great efforts of the Sisters of Charity and the nuns of the two Convents, save the poor children from the vice, corruption and ignorance to which they would otherwise be abandoned. The poor children I saw at St. Mary's Convent, clean, well-educated and healthy, under the guidance of the most perfect women on this earth, gave me a hope that our Celtic race is not yet extinct. The daughters of the wealthy are also preserved from the epidemic of imitation now so fashionable. In that beautifully located convent, they receive an education fully equal in point of acquirements and talent to the best organized schools on the continent. And they have before them the example of every virtue. If the British Government had one hundredth part of the zeal for the good of Ireland, that these noble women have for the children, rich and poor, confided to their care, how different would the poor country be to-day!

Of those who are dear to you I have already spoken. Of matters of local interest you know more than I do, being a stranger in the city. I have only to add that your name is venerated and respected, and that here and elsewhere, when calumny dared to throw a stain upon it, public opinion threw back the infamy on the authors.

With warmest wishes for your happiness and success,
I remain, &c., J. P. L.

EXTERMINATING THE IRISH.

From the Belfast Ulsterman.

This is the work which England has been laboring at for nearly seven centuries without success. She almost effected the humane and Christian task in the time of Oliver Cromwell, when the population was reduced to about eight hundred thousand souls—when cargoes of Irishmen and women were sent to sea in ships that were sold for slaves in the West Indies. Cromwell laughed, and said the work was done.

But when the claw of the tigress was taken from the throat of the nation, the people sprung up again, and prolifically increased, spreading over the land where they, its children, were abhorred as aliens; and pouring a rich tide of manhood to the far end of the earth.

Famine again came, and seemed about to do the work in which the tyrant had failed; and again the English legislature laughed grimly like Cromwell, and said what a glorious thing it would be if the Atlantic flowed over Ireland for 24 hours, and washed its troublesome population away like rats.

Still the famine and the plague did not desolate the land. Six millions and a half of people yet remained. But a new agency of destruction has come into play; the Encumbered Estates Court. The land of the country is passing into new hands. English lawyers and Scotch grocers; and the alien masters of the Irish serfs are sweeping the peasantry from their homes.

A Pollock is desolating Galway. Thousands of human beings, warm-blooded, warm-hearted men and women, are driven from the scene of their childhood. Their cottages are pulled down; their hedges are levelled; and thousands of four-footed beasts—more loved than man by modern "civilization"—browse over the fields they lived and labored on. And rivals of Pollock in the fattening of sheep and the extermination of human beings, are doing like work in other places. In little more than a year five hundred thousand souls have been swept from the face of this island.

And still the work goes on. What in the bye-gone centuries England could not do by massacre and persecution, the new proprietors are trying to effect with the sheriff's writ. We learn from the Cork Examiner that, on Monday last, eleven families were cleared at one swoop from an estate in that county recently purchased in the Incumbered Estates Court. The expulsion of the eleven families was only a precursory movement; for a larger number remaining behind have got notice that their houses, too, shall be pulled down about their ears. This story of extermination is published in the Examiner, and as a commentary upon the affair—revolting, horribly grotesque—that paper and the Freeman, both commenting on it, tell us that the landlord, who thus makes a clean sweep of a people, is nevertheless, "a kind-hearted humane man"—a "well-disposed man." Is not this monstrous?

But, most grotesque of all—the Freeman perpetrates the following extraordinary sentence:—"We do not attribute to the purchaser of the property on which this occurred any harshness of feeling towards his tenantry!" Is not this startingly gentle and considerate? A man buys an Irish estate; and the first thing he does is to sweep the people off it. And the Tenant League Editor of the Freeman is so mealy-mouthed (God save the mark!) that he will not attribute to this man "any harshness of feeling to his tenantry!" Is it not sickening in a country where the present population are swept off the land like vermin, to read such hideous stuff in a "popular journal?" No wonder that the so-called Tenant Right movement should be a failure, when one of its leaders who looks on so calmly at the extermination of the people, is as sensitive as a waiting-gentlewoman lest he should hurt the feelings of a "kind-hearted, humane" landlord who flings some sixty or seventy human beings out on the highway at one swoop.

Palmer, the murderer of half a dozen of people, was a gentlemanly, agreeable fellow of affectionate manners; but we don't remember that anybody called him a "kind-hearted, humane man." An Irish landlord sweeps the peasantry off his estate wholesale, to replace them with brute beasts, and two popular Irish journals call him "kind-hearted and humane," and "well-disposed," and the editor of one of them is nervously anxious not to attribute to this benevolent person "any harshness of feeling" to the tenantry whom he exterminates. Verily, the Irish peasantry ought to be proud of their newspaper champions and tenantright leaders.

Well, now, we won't accuse this man of "harshness of feeling" either. We give him the credit of simply following his instincts. He wants to be rich as fast as he can. Tenantry are a trouble—quite "a bore;" and sheep and oxen are pleasanter to deal with. He has no "harshness of feeling" to the peasantry; but he likes them not; he does not care about them; he much prefere fat beasts; so he pitches them out on the road side, and levels their cots, to make way for the brutes.

Such is a model of a "well-disposed, kind-hearted, humane" landlord, after the new rule of morals laid down by our philanthropic cotemporaries.

So goes the work of desolation. Stick to it, landlords of Ireland. Ply the crowbar merrily. Clear the Celts of the soil. The laws protect and support you in the goodly work. The people submit to their doom. And popular Irish journalists and tenant league leaders stand at your elbow to proclaim that you are "kind-hearted, humane, well-disposed men," and gallantly to deny that you exhibit any "harshness of feeling" to the human creatures whom you hunt away like rats.

DISTINGUISHED WEXFORDMEN.

The honor and glory of Wexfordmen being dear to us at home and abroad, says the Wexford Independent, it is with no ordinary feelings of gratification that we have to add another glorious name to that galaxy of Heroes which has thrown a halo round the 'Model County.' Having read in a recent number of L'Echo du Nord that it was the intention of the French government to extend the ramparts and fortifications of Lille; and that the Governor of the fortress, General Heron, had been summoned by the Minister of War to Paris, to give such evidence as his experience in that citadel mght suggest, it struck us that the name belonged to Wexford—and that it was worth making some inquiries on the subject. Accordingly, we mentioned the impression that was on our mind to Mr. J. R. Crosbie—late Mayor of Wexford, who replied—"your conjectures are quite right, for I have just received a letter from the gallant gentleman, which is at your service." From that letter we have infinite pleasure in taking the following extracts, which will be perused with interest by our readers. A Wexford man, Governor of one of the greatest fortresses in the world, is no ordinary occurrence; and such airs as "God save the Queen," "Patrick's Day" and "Paddy O'Rafferty" on an Irish Bagpipes, must sound strangely in the ears of our French neighbors:

"I learned you were Mayor of Wexford some time ago. This good news was given to me by an Irish gentleman, who is an officer of the English army. He left Sebastopol lately, where he assisted with his regiment in the different battles; on his way home he passed through France, and after having taken the Redan, the Tower of the Malakoff, and Sebastopol, he naturally wished to see the finest fortress or citadel of first rank that we have in France; and yesterday he came here to see and visit the fortress of Lille, of which I am the Governor for the last six years.

"He was very agreeably surprised in finding in me a countryman, and I felt great pleasure in showing him, as I do to all Irish and English tourists, or travellers, all the works, batteries, fortifications, and curiosities of the place. In our conversation on Ireland, and the county of Wexford particularly, he easily perceived how happy I was to talk on that subject, and on his return to the hotel, he very kindly sent me, as a present, a parcel, or lot, of old newspapers, printed in Wexford, about three years ago; they formed his chief amusement in his tent, when he was far away from family and friends, at Inkermann, near Sebastopol, and the same old Wexford newspapers give me now great pleasure in reading them. This poor fellow was severely wounded during the war in the Crimea, where the brave and valiant armies of France and England, united together by the noblest sentiments, marched side by side to conquest and victory; their mutual confidence, courage and energy, placed the glorious colors of England and France on the proud fortifications of Malakoff and Sebastopol. The French General who came with his brigade to the succour of the English army, at the battle of Inkermann, is my brother-in-law, you may easily conceive his great pleasure in thrashing the Russians, and in retaking from them the English redoubts.

"I have just read in one of my precious Wexford papers, an article printed long ago, and headed 'A Wexfordman in the French army.' Its author mentions his having heard the band of one of our regiments, commanded by Charles Sutton, playing Patrick's Day. The reigment was then marching down from Paris, to come here; when it, and Charles our friend and cousin, stopped with me for two years in the fortress under my orders.

"I am sorry the author of that article of news did not come on here. I am sorry he did not come to see my fortress, as I would have been very happy to have given him the agreeable surprise of hearing here, by the bands of the three regiments in quarters, in the citadel, not only "Patrick's Day," but "God Save the Queen," "Paddy O'Rafferty," "Donnybrook Fair," &c., &c., and if he preferred them, Tom Moore's Melodies, that I got over, with a bagpipes, from London. I have often surprised thus many Irish and English travelers, and if our author in question had entered the Citadel of Lille, he would have seen not one, but two, Wexfordmen in the French army, and have heard our bands playing "God Save the Queen," &c., &c., at least all the bands that come here under my orders."

A NOBLE LESSON.

From the Evening Mail.

Mr. Wm. Dargan has taught his countrymen many a noble lesson of energy and self-reliance, by the example of his own life and career; but we have no hesitation in saying that the noblest lesson he has ever inculcated is that contained in a short speech delivered at the opening of the Cookstown Railway. He says:

"Since I was ten years old, I have been hearing that we are unable to take care of ourselves—that we are unable to do anything for our own prosperity, and that we must have English capital, English judgment, English enterprise, English management, English everything."

Every Irishman will recognize the truth of Mr. Dargan's reminiscences, but how seldom is an Irishman found at once willing to assert the practicability of Irish independence, and prepared with an example in support of his argument? Mr. Dargan, we believe, was never enrolled on the lists of either the Young or Old Irelanders, but there he stood, at Cookstown, in the presence of Her Majesty's representative, himself a living assertion that Ireland may achieve prosperity if her sons will only learn to depend upon their own ability, energy, and industry, and draw boldly upon resources immediately within their reach. In a few figures, jotted down from memory, while he sat listening to the chairman proposing his health, Mr. Dargan amply supported his argument by a pregnant example:

"We have," he said, "now spent about eighteen millions of money in this country. Twelve millions of that have been eminently successful, and yields a most remunerative return to the shareholders. Two millions are still struggling, but in the hope of a successful issue not being yet developed. Three millions have also been spent and developed, and that being the result, I think that I may, without making any invidious comparison, explain how this happened. These twelve millions have been the management of our individual people, our noblemen, our gentlemen, our men of business, of our own peculiar neighborhood. The two millions not productive, but still paying from one to three per cent, are under the management of our towns and country. The three millions which have produced nothing are purely English capital and English management. I do not say this for any invidious purpose, nor do I say it under any but the most generous and good feeling toward our English neighbors, who so kindly came forward and invested their money, which, I am sorry to say, is not productive."

No one will doubt the sincerity of Mr. Dargan's concluding sentence; and, in truth, had he been less desirous of teaching his countrymen than gratifying their vanity, he might have pointed to the management and dividends of many of our lines of railway, in proof of a very great superiority of practical business capacity on this side of the Irish Sea. The lesson was received with loud cheers by those to whom it was addressed, and we trust it may sink deep into the understanding of all Irishmen. We want no element of prosperity but self-reliance, and Mr. Dargan has shown that, even in that, there are men among us who know that—

"By how much we endeavor,
By so much courage mounteth for the occasion."

IRISH ABBEYS AND CHURCHES.

From the Irish Reporter.

Cork Cathedral.—The ancient Gothic church dedicated to St. Finbar was taken down in the year 1725. The present one, a plain, uninteresting structure, square tower-steeple, was erected a few years after.

Waterford Cathedral.—The ancient cathedral, which was probably the work of the Danes, was removed some years since, and replaced by a beautiful church of Grecian architecture. In the arch-diocese of Cashel there are numerous remains of abbeys and other conventual Gothic churches.

Clonfert Cathedral.—The church of Clonfert is said to have been erected by John, Bishop of Clonfert, in the year 1270. It was once famous for its seven altars, dedicated to St. Brendan, the original founder of the bishopric. The beauty of its western front has been formerly commemorated by Ware, and according to some other writers it is still, considering the age in which it was erected, deserving of admiration.

St. Fenton's Church.—In the neighborhood of Howth, near Sutton, there is a small chapel or oratory dedicated to St. Fenton, remarkable for little else than being the smallest place of worship in existence; its dimensions not exceeding twelve feet in length, by about eight feet broad. There is, however, a small belfry attached to the end of it, over the pointed arch entrance, and the eastern wing forms a rude cinque-foiled arch, but very small.

Cashel Cathedral.—The cathedral of this place is a modern structure of great beauty, but the ruins of the ancient church are situated on the summit of the rock of Cashel. These remains, together with those of Cormac's chapel and the ancient round tower, form, in conjunction with the bold and rocky hill on which their foundations rest, a pile of ruins truly magnificent. From the best accounts now extant, this church was founded about the year 1086, by Donald O'Brien, of the royal house of the kings of Munster. Some, however, think it older, and ascribe it to Cormac, the founder of the chapel. Sir James Ware has said it was founded about the time of the English invasion, but Dr. Campbell, the author of the Philosophical Survey, has corrected this mis-statement, and quoted the ancient record in support of his assertion. The architecture of the church is of such an early style as evidently corroborates this account, from which it appears that, with the exception of Christ Church, Dublin, these remains are the most ancient of any of our pointed Gothic cathedral churches. When this cathedral was originally built, Donald, the founder, converted Cormac's chapel into a chapter house for the use of the church. About 200 years after its erection, having fallen into decay, it was re-edified under the primacy of Archbishop O'Hedian. Connected with this cathedral there was also another building—the episcopal palace—but being unfortunately fortified and converted into a garrison during the civil wars, it was besieged and almost destroyed by the assailants. The cathedral suffered at the same time nearly equal dilapidation, but its final ruin was afterwards effected by Archbishop Price, who—from what motive is now uncertain—about the year 1746, unroofed the building.

Callan Abbey.—There is at this place the ruins of a friary, which was founded and endowed by James, Earl of Ormond, about the year 1440. The building was originally a handsome Gothic structure, but was nearly destroyed with the rest of the town, at its capture by Cromwell. There are, however, some vestiges of the choir and tower still remaining, which denote the former beauty of its style of architecture. The ruins of the parish church also exhibited some fine specimens of Gothic, but so dilapidated by time and the ruthless hand of war, that at the present day the few of them which remain excite regret rather than admiration.

Bective Abbey, or as it is sometimes written, Bectiff Abbey, was founded by Murchard O'Melaghin, king of Meath, in the year 1146, for Cistercian monks, according to Ware and Archdall. The abbot was of that superior class who sat in parliament as spiritual lords, and were called mitred abbots. The wealth of this monastery was very great, as appears from the catalogue of the various lands in their possession at the dissolution. The ruins of it, situated on the Boyne, between Trim and Navan, are extensive, and comprise several beautiful specimens of pointed arches and other remnants of Gothic architecture.

Ferns Cathedral is situated at a village of the same name in the county of Wexford. It was formerly of more importance than at present, being then esteemed the metropolitan church of the province. This distinction, however, in those times could not be considered a local honor, as it is attached to the senior bishop of the district. The present cathedral is a modern parish church, which has been erected adjoining the ruins of the ancient Gothic cathedral. Some remains of the original structure are still extant on the boundaries of the bishop's demesne, to which they are a venerable ornament.

SKETCHES BY THE WAYSIDE—THE DEATH OF KINGS.

From the Tipperary Vindicator.

No. 2.

Luagha's son Crintha ascended the throne in the year of Christ thirty-nine, and after a long successful reign, perished by a fall from his horse. His son reigned after him, and was succeeded by Fiatagh Fin, who after a few short and unhappy wars was slain by Fiacha Finola, grandson of Brinthan. We now arrive at a remarkable period in Irish history, and at the great civil war between the original inhabitants and the Spanish conquerors, which desolated the country for upwards of twenty years, and which almost surpassed in horror the awful scenes of the first French revolution. Like all successful invaders, the Milesians had treated the vanquished race with great severity. They were jealously excluded from all offices of rank and emolument, and the meanest descendant of Goadhal was esteemed superior to the proudest of their nobles. For long years they had lived in this state of oppression, cherishing the remembrance of their ancient glories, and filled with the bitterest hate against those who had subdued them. There is no hatred so intense and bitter as that which a conquered race bears to those that have enslaved them; time cannot dissipate it, kindness cannot extinguish it, and severity adds to it but fresh intensity. It spreads through the land like a train of powder, which neeeds but a daring hand to fire and overwhelm all in ruin. There was at this time in Ireland, a bold and crafty man named Cabre Rin Cait, one in every way fitted to be the leader in a popular movement. Designing, ruthless, and fearless, with a heart dead to every feeling of mercy, he devised a scheme which, atrocious and bloody as it was, promised, if successful, to extinguish for ever the dominant power. Fiacho and his nobles were invited to a grand banquet at Moyern. For nine days the feast continued. They banqueted on the pleasant green sward, attended by the obsequious conspirators. There was brought the fresh salmon from Lough Corrib, and the speckled trout; the herrings from Galway bay; the stately deer from the wilds of Connemara; and the huge casks of meal from Mayo. Day after day nobles came pouring in. In the day they hunted, and every evening rested from their toils and feasted. The brimming methers passed quickly round the board, the inspiring songs of the bards lent new intoxication to the scene, and in the madness of their mirth they spurned their obsequious attendants and dashed the liquor in their faces. These bore the insults patiently and in silence, for they knew the time for a stern reckoning was at hand, and on the ninth day as the revellers sunk down on the ground and slept the dull heavy sleep of intoxication, the conspirators commenced their deadly work. It was a calm, beautiful night; the breeze softly stirred the forest trees, and musically murmured amid their leaves, and the moon cast a soft gentle light over the bloody scene. There lay the haughty conquerors at the mercy of those they had oppressed, who now stood over them with exulting faces and sparkling arms, about to exact a terrible expiation for their injuries. The signal was given—the axe and knife commenced to do their deadly work — soon the green grass grew red with blood, as noble after noble fell. "This for thee," murmurred Cabre, as he plunged a skaine into the heart of the sleeping monarch, adding another to the long list of Irish Kings who had perished by violence, and when the morning dawned, there lay the King and his nobles cold and lifeless, while the exulting crowd, amid the very scene of slaughter, solemnly crowned the successful leader of the revolt as their monarch.

A few nobles still held out for Tuathel, son of the murdered Fiacha, and after a long and desperate struggle, the Milesians recovered their former dominion, and the exile resumed the throne of his ancestors. Truly it was no good fortune for him. Better had he lived and died in banishment; for his reign was bloody and disastrous, and he too experienced nearly as sorrowful a fate as his brother—for at the battle of Moyline, in Ulster, he was slain by Mal, who seized the throne which he himself had rendered vacant by slaughter. He did not long enjoy his ill-acquired rank. Four years after, as he hunted one day alone, he was surprised by a band of armed men. Their leader advanced towards him. He was young and tall, and his fair hair, fell in long curling locks on his shoulder. "Knowest thou me, O Mal?" he exclaimed. "For many a moon have I tracked thy step; as thy shadow have I followed thee. Night and day have I been waiting for the time when I could claim thee as mine own. So it is come! The god of day shall hear thy prayers no more, and thus does the son of Tuathel revenge the murder of his parent." With that he raised his sword, and the moment after, the headless, palpitating corpse lay at his feet. Feilin, a rare exception to the general rule, died a natural death, and was succeeded by Cathire More, who after a reign of thirty years, fell at the battle of Moyacha, in Meath. Con of the Hundred Battles ascends the vacant throne. From all accounts of this monarch, we discern a striking resemblance between him and Charles XII., of Sweden. Both brave and gallant warriors, but rude, impatient and tyrannical—reckless of their subjects' lives as of their own—unhappy when at peace—living but for war.

Con speedily reduced the neighboring monarchs to subjection; but to effect this, he inflicted the thousand miseries of war on his kingdom, and, at length, his subjects, however proud of his fame, longed heartily for a moment's peace, and determined to throw off his authority. In this, however, they were forestalled, for having had some trifling dispute with his brothers, they, unmindful of all the benefits which he had showered on them, unmindful that at the same breast they had been suckled, that the same father had offered prayers for them together, determined to assassinate him, and Con, after escaping scatheless the dangers of one hundred fights, fell basely and ignobly by the hands of hired bravos, in a wood near Tara. He was succeeded by Conare, who was slain by his brother-in-law, who, however, by this, failed to secure possession of the crown—for Art, son of Con, was declared monarch by the universal consent of the nation. Not long after he ascended the throne, he banished his nephew Mac Con, who was chief judge of Ulster. He retired into Albania, but soon after returned with a powerful army, with which he landed in Galway bay. Art encountered him at Athenry A desperate battle ensued—for both parties knew that on this single action depended their life or death. At length the King of Connaught fell—his troops gave way. Art in vain endeavored to rally them, and so, finding the contest hopeless, collected a few chosen followers, he charged desperately into the very midst of the enemy, and there fell, sword in hand, and covered with wounds, and Con, his successful antagonist, reigns in his stead. He did not long enjoy his dangerous pre-eminence—for he was driven from the throne by Cormac Ulfada, and perished miserably afterwards, being assassinated by a Druid in Munster. Cormac was succeeded by Gaibre Liffeachair, who too fell on the field, being slain by his revolted soldiery at the battle of Gabhra in Meath. Two sons of Mac Con then seized the crown, which seemed to be worn only to obtain misery for its possessor. One brother slew the other, and the survivor, not long after, fell beneath the swords of the soldiers at the desperate engagement of Ollarbha. Fiacha Streabthuine then ascended the throne. He waged a long war with the people of Munster, and while his son was absent there with the greater portion of the army, the three Collas raised the standard of rebellion, and the unfortunate monarch was slain by them at the battle of Failton. The eldest of the Collas then seized the crown, but after a reign of four years, he was compelled to fly the land by Muireadhach Tireach, son of the murdered Fiach. He, too, fell in battle, and was succeeded by Caolvacha, the last monarch of the race of Ar, who, in the first year that he bore the sceptre, perished miserably by assassination, adding another to the long dark roll of the unfortunate Kings of Ireland.

THE ROYAL FAMILY OF UPPER SCINDE.

From the Nation.

Dublin has been enlivened to an unusual extent during the past week, by the presence of his Royal Highness Ali Moarad Khan, King of Upper Scinde, the Prince, his son, and a numerous suite of attendants. The distinguished party have taken up their abode for the brief period of their sojourn in Dublin, at the Imperial Hotel, Sackville-street, the doors of which are besieged daily by crowds eagerly on the watch for a glimpse of the illustrious Orientals. The Imperial Prince is an object of wonder and amazement to our worthy burgesses, who see in him the realisation of much they had previously deemed incredible in eastern tales. And indeed the costliness of his costume, the dazzling array of gems of priceless value that glitter on his person, are not more indicative of the stranger's rank, than the stamp which nature has set upon his brow—the lofty and dignified mien—the proud and noble bearing that mark one born of a governing race, a Prince of blood as pure, of lineage as high and ancient, as European King or Kaisar can boast.

There is something peculiarly interesting to us Irishmen in the visit of this illustrious Prince; the circumstances under which he is amongst us, give him a powerful claim on our attention and respectful sympathy. Even thus did the Royal Princes of Erin leave their rightful thrones and homes to sue in vain for justice at the court of the plunderer and spoliator. Here in Ireland Ali Moarad Khant reads a country, in which all the machinations to which his kingdom has fallen a prey—duplicity, treachery, ingratitude, broken faith, covetousness and fraud—were exercised, with a like result centuries ago, by the very same power, England. He must be struck not alone with this coincidence; the Irish national color, green, is that dear to his heart, as the color of the standard under which he so often led his cohorts to victory. Ireland does, indeed, offer peculiar attractions to this royal stranger.

Since his arrival he has occupied the most of his time in visiting not mere objects of curiosity, but the various institutions, manufactories, &c., where a knowledge of the country, its productions and manufactures may be learned. He is an attentive student of everything in this line; he has visited the principal houses in the various trades in the city, and given enormously extensive orders. Our manufacture of arms has had a large share of his attention. He has visited the establishments of Messrs. Rigby and Messrs. Truelock, both of whom he has largely patronised.

On Thursday he announced through his Secretary, his intention of visiting on that day, the principal and most extensive of these wonderful institutions, the 'Monster Houses'—that of Messrs. Cannock, White & Co., Henry-street, where he arrived about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, accompanied by his son, the Prince, Secretary, and Armourer. The royal party were received on their arrival by two of the firm, Mr. Macnaught and Mr. Lombard, who accompanied them through the entire extent of those vast premises, over which they were conducted by one of the superintendents, Mr. Freemans. Every department formed the subject of minute inquiry and examination on the part of the royal visitors. The furore to get a glimpse of them on the part of the hundreds who happened to be present when they entered, swelled by crowds who forced their way from the street, suspended all business for the time, not only in this establishment, but in most of those in Henry-street and Mary-street, which were all rapidly deserted on the news that these lions were in the locality. The royal party having made many costly purchases, and given extensive orders in several departments, and having partaken of some refreshment, took their departure about half-past five o'clock.

In passing through the maze of counters on the ground floor, which was thronged with curious sight-seers, anxious to get a glimpse of the gem-bedecked Prince, he good humoredly remarked to one of his attendants, that the three hundred strapping fellows employed as assistants in the concern, would make a fine show in the Eastern military uniform.

We may observe that in the Secretary to his Royal Highness, we claim not only a countryman, but a fellow-citizen. Edward Lees Coffey, Esq., many years a resident in India. The Prince could make no better selection. An acquaintance with the history of his own unfortunate country, cannot fail to qualify Mr. Coffey as an invaluable counsellor to a Prince the victim of British avarice, and perfidy, and ingratitude.

Alban Butler.—It is well known from the memoir of the author prefixed to the Edinburgh edition (1800) of the "Lives of the Saints," that Alban Butler died President of the College of St. Omer's, May 15th, 1773. It is remarkable that his nephew, Mr. Charles Butler, who compiled the above memoir, and placed a monument to his memory in the College chapel, says nothing of the circumstances of his death. We are informed that his death was caused by a dose of poison accidentally administered to him through the carelessness of a surgeon of St. Omer's. The fact, it would seem, was not made public at the time, through the wish of the family to conceal the painful circumstance, a wish which was the more easily gratified on account of the absence of all post mortem inquiries on the Continent.

Answers to Correspondents.

Our recent visit to Boston afforded us a sincere delight. The reception we met with from the President, Secretary and other officers of the Columbian Association, was courteous and cordial in the extreme. The Tremont was crowded with an intelligent and enthusiastic audience. The supper at the Parker House, after the Lecture, was a display of the most elegant and profuse hospitality. Wit, song, patriotism, and social eloquence heightened the flavor of the choice wines and fruits. The pleasant and manly union of several Irishmen, hitherto separated on such occasions, was the crowning feature of the scene.

We promised ourselves the pleasure of saying something very brilliant about John Brougham's miraculous feat of last week. That trip of his to Philadelphia, beats the most dazzling wonder of the Arabian Nights. But a crowd of importunate business, (several days waiting to be attended to,) compels us to forego the pleasure we anticipated. The New-York Press, however, and the Philadelphia and Boston papers also, have so conspicuously chronicled the event, that we feel our regret in thus hurriedly glancing at it, considerably soothed. It will not, however, be thoroughly soothed until we find ourselves seated in the Bowery on the occasion of the contemplated benefit to the Manager, who has annihilated time and space, and made two cities happy.

AN IRISH LOVE DITTY OF THE LAST CENTURY.

[Translated by M. Doheny.]

My Mary roon, thou apple bloom,
Let not that wooing Munster man
Blight thy blue eyes, with coaxing lies,
Which oft he tries where'er he can.
I'd rather far, my darling star,
As fair ones are, thou'dst live a maid,
Than wed a lover, a lying rover,
The world over who has betrayed.

I deemed my storeen, so young and glowing,
That thou wert going to steal with me
Each evening bright, and Sunday night,
To glad my sight on yonder lea.
O'er hill and hollow, my love I'd follow,
And ne'er should sorrow disturb thy rest;
If I were thine own, and thou wert mine own,
My head reclined on thy whitest breast.

Dost mind the night, of cloudless light,
When on the height of Mullaghmor,
I kissed thy hair, and forehead fair,
Young beauty rarest o'er and o'er.
'Tis thou indeed, who hast decreed,
My heart to bleed, to cure no more;
My heart of hearts is torn in parts,
By thy dear arts, my sweetest star.

A correspondent furnishes us with the following extract from an article of General Vallancey, inserted in the second volume of the "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," relative to the colony planted in the far-famed "Baronies of Forth and Barjie," Wexford, by Hervey de Montmorency, under a grant from Dermod MacMorough:—

"When we were first acquainted with this colony, a few of both sexes wore the ancient dress; that of the men was a short coat, waistcoat, and trunk breeches, with a round hat and narrow rim: that of the women was a short jacket, a petticoat, bordered at the bottom with one, two, or three rows of ribband, or tape of a different color; the dress of the head was a kircher. The people of these baronies live well, are industrious, cleanly, and of good morals; the poorest farmer eats meat twice a week, and the table of the wealthy farmer is daily covered with beef, mutton, or fowl. The beverage is home-brewed ale and beer, of an excellent flavor and color. The houses of the poorest are well built and well thatched; all have out-offices for cattle, fowls, carts, or cars. The people are well clothed, and are strong and laborious. The women do all manner of rustic work, plowing excepted; they receive equal wages with the men. The professed religion here is the Roman Catholic; there are about one hundred Catholics to one Protestant. Marriage is solemnized much in the same manner as with the Irish. The relations and friends bring a profusion of viands of all kinds, and feasting and dancing continues all the night; the bride sits veiled at the head of the table, unless called out to dance, when the chair is filled by one of the bride-maids. At every marriage, an apple is cut into small pieces, and thrown among the crowd; a custom they brought from England, but the origin of it has not descended with it."

Sarsfield. There is a most beauteous variety of scenery in the vicinity of Lucan. The meanderings of the Liffy are there marked by a captivating alternation of hanging-wood, acclivitous rock, and gentle slope. Between Chapel Izode and Lucan the banks are cultivated to their utmost capacity, and produce an abundance of most delicious strawberries. We believe it was Montmorency who compared it to Heidelberg, in the Palatinate of the Rhine, overhanging the lovely Necker. The family of Sarsfield located on the manor of Lucan, in the sixteenth century. William Sarsfield, of Lucan, was knighted in 1566, for his services against Shane O'Neill, Dynast of Tyrone, and the noble Patrick Sarsfield was made Earl of Lucan by James II.

Tipperary. Amongst the brilliant geniuses cotemporary with Curran on the Munster Circuit, "Pleasant Ned Lysaght," as he was familiarly designated, held a distinguished place. Madden says, that if Ben Johnson had known him, he would have had a fine subject for "gathering humours." That he might have given the poet a stock subject for seizing all the points of Irish character in its essential features. That he was a thorough Irishman—brave, brilliant, witty, eloquent, and devil-may-care. Thos. Davis says: "We have but one good Volunteer Song." It was written by Lysaght, after that illustrious Militia was dissolved." The song breathes praise of Grattan, "the man who led the van of the Irish Volunteers. It, with his "Sprig of Shillelagh" and "Kate of Garnavilla," will be sung and admired while a Celt exists.

"The Royal Hospital, Kilmainham, Dublin, was founded in the reign of Charles II. for "such officers and soldiers of his Majesty's army in Ireland as are, or may become, unfit for service from age, wounds, or other infirmities." The Duke of Ormonde laid the first stone in 1680. At that time the Phœnix Park, which is now confined to the North side of the Liffey, contained 71 acres to the South of the river, which land had formerly belonged to the Knights Templars, and subsequently to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. The walls of the chapel and some remains of a priory belonging to those Knights were then existing. The stones of the ruins were carefully removed, and compose part of the chapel appertaining to the present institution.

Eblana.—Thomas Cloney was one of the bravest and most disinterested of the gallant Wexfordmen of '98. Fearless, compassionate, high-minded and unbending, his career from the day he joined the insurgents to the close of the eventful campaign—to the brilliancy of which he so vigorously contributed at Three Rocks, Fooke's Mill, and New-Ross—was one to recommend his name to the loving care of all true Irishmen. He was the son of an honest farmer in comfortable circumstances, named Denis Cloney, of Moneyhore, situated within a few miles of Enniscorthy. Thomas was about 23 years old when his heart and arm were called on to succor his fatherland. '98 over, he suffered much persecution, but after being imprisoned, tried and passed for several years from the hands of one official to an other, he was at last "set at liberty." His unwavering magnanimity to the Royalist prisoners, during the campaign of Wexford, was the chief reason why he was not, like Harvey, Kelly, Colclough, and others, hanged. During the struggling and victorious days of the Catholic Association, Thomas Cloney, as usual, was on the side of truth and justice. His "honest and manly spirit" in the cause was duly recognized by a resolution in the New Catholic Association, January, 1827; and in 1830 the Government added its testimony to his worth and patriotism, by including him with O'Connell in the arrests of that year. The names of the parties so honored will no doubt be of interest to you. They were as follows: D. O'Connell, Edward Dwyer, Secretary of the C. A., Thomas Cloney, John Lawless, John Redmond, Thomas Steele, Richard Barrett, and John Reynolds. Cloney died in 1850.

We refer J. Williamson, for a reply, to the address of Robert J. Walker, the speeches of Governor Floyd and Senator Hunter, of Virginia.

"The old Land"—Not up to mark. To E. O'N., we say ditto.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1856.

THANKSGIVING DAY.

Mayor's Office, New-York,
Nov. 13, 1856.

Acknowledging our dependence on Almighty God, and duly sensible that to his mercy we are indebted for continued peace, prosperity, and general public health, while other communities, less favored, have been sorely afflicted with pestilence and devastation, we are now called upon to return thanks to the Author of our being, the Protector of our lives, and the Dispenser of all the blessings we enjoy.

With these sentiments, and in pursuance of custom and the proclamation of his Excellency, Myron H. Clark, Governor of the State of New-York, recommending that Thursday, the 20th day of November instant, be set aside as a day of Praise, Thanksgiving, and Prayer, I recommend the people of this city to observe that day as such with all due reverence and solemnity.

Given under my hand and Seal of the Mayoralty, the day and year aforesaid. Fernando Wood, Mayor. [L. S.]

These suggestive words reflect as well as inspire the deepest feelings and the brightest thoughts which grow from the struggles, hopes, and successes of an active and powerful community. This proclamation is a text from which every heart—whatever its religious creed, theological, technological, or political partizanship—may preach, and in the honest eloquence of thanks, create no rivalry to mar the universal and sublime happiness that consecrates the day.

In the midst of a commercial prosperity unequalled—a prosperity which, through very excess of duty, it would seem, cannot protect itself. After a political struggle unparalleled in the annals of the Republic, and no where more formidable or more relentless in its partisanship than in this State—after a season of health, wealth, and prosperity; after a series of threatened European disruptions, in which the inviolability and simplicity of the Republican system was sustained, and the audacity of the English system rebuked and humbled—after passing through these arduous phases of political and domestic history, it is well that we, forgetful of all differences, take breath, and remembering we are brothers, join our voices in the one prayer—the one fervent ebullition of praise and thanksgiving to the Father and Protector of all.

THE RED STAR OF NICARAGUA.

The flag of Nicaragua has been recently changed, and a Red Star substituted for the five volcanoes. That star is now in the ascendant. It is the star of victory, of hope, and of vengeance. It flames redly in the Southern sky, pointing the path to future conquest—guiding the gallant soldiers of the North on the track of the barbarous marauders who have dared to invade the soil, and plunder the homes of the rejuvenated Republic of Nicaragua. By late accounts, the reported victories of Walker are fully confirmed. The enemy has been signally repulsed, and driven in utter confusion from Granada. Every steamer from the United States to San Juan Del Norte brings fresh recruits to the Nicaraguan army, now numbering two thousand fighting men, and additional supplies of arms and ammunition, Minnie rifles, mountain howzters, and saucy looking field-pieces. The English fleet still rides at anchor in the bay of San Juan. The English don't like General Walker, for he is not a recognised filibuster according to the international polity of kings. Nicaragua is not a member of the royal family of nations, and Walker is a "mere" republican. Though England has filibustered from the Shannon to the Ganges, she has latterly become a paragon of national morality in all matters connected with our Western hemisphere. She now only aspires to be the meek distributor of Exeter Hall bibles and Manchester cotton, except when a slip of territory is to be annexed, or a royal house sacked in India, then she is a thorough-paced filibuster, bold, bare-faced and utterly without conscience.

The slanders circulated by that portion of the press of the United States, which delights in paying court to everything Anglo-Saxon, have been laid bare by the recent news from Granada. In order to prevent reinforcements from reaching General Walker, until the coalition against Nicaragua had been completed, and the schemes of the intermeddling European powers fully matured, it was daily paraded in the columns of those journals, that forty men of the Nicaraguan army had been shot for mutiny upon the plaza of Granada. This stale slander is now contradicted by El Nicaraguense. No men belonging to the army have been shot for insubordination, for none existed. The army is loyal to its general, full of ardor and patriotism, and impatient again to meet the enemy. One of Walkers officers having been taken and shot, he promptly retaliated by shooting two of their's in return. When Granada was attacked, in the absence of Walker, there were only one hundred and fifty men under the command of General Fry to oppose a force of a thousand men.

They never for a moment thought of retreat. Their resolution was sternly taken. They threw themselves into the principal houses around the Plaza, occupied all the strong points in that quarter, and swept the enemy down with well-directed vollies, whenever they made their appearance. "But," says the El Nicaraguense, "the hottest of the fight was centered about the guard-house. The position of this building rendered it open to the shots of the enemy from three sides. In fact, shots could reach it and do deadly execution from all parts of the large palza, as well as from nearly all parts of the lesser plaza of St. Sebastian. Captain Swingle, of the Ordnance, was very active in defence of this post, assisted most nobly by Theodore Lane. The latter gentleman is said to have proved himself on this occasion to be the very type of endurance and courage. While assisting in defending this post, the Hon. Thomas Basye received two wounds, neither of which is dangerous. The hospital, too, was an important place, and was defended under the supervision of the Hon. Judge Wilkins. This gentleman's military experience was now found of much advantage. Between the hospital and the guard-house, on the opposite side of the Plaza of St. Sebastian, is situate the residence of Col. Wheeler, United States Minister. Its fortunate location saved it and the lives of all its occupants. The commander of the attacking forces was heard several times during the night to offer large rewards to any person who would go and tear down the American flag which was in front of the Minister's door; but there was not one man found courageous enough to attempt the daring venture. The enemy did not gain one single important position after they had been in the city two hours, and in their hopelessness they offered the most liberal terms to the citizens if they would lay down their arms and surrender as prisoners of war. To this they invariably replied, "Americans never surrender," and with three cheers for General Walker, poured fierce volleys again into the positions of their enemies. Their assailants next tried to intimidate them by telling them that General Walker had been beaten at Massaya, and that before many hours there would be a force of four thousand strong brought against them, and that those flushed with their recent victory would easily overcome them, and murder every American man, woman, and child they saw. But the reply, "Let them come — Americans never surrender," and three cheers for General Walker, and another murderous volley, was what they got for their attempted deceit and duplicity. In the morning, the already large force of the enemy was augmented by about three hundred men from Massaya, making in all ten hundred and fifty men. Many are of the opinion that there were as many as twelve hundred of the enemy here before General Walker returned. Nearly one-third of the entire force which came into Granada must have been killed." The reinforcements, now on their way to Nicaragua, will enable Walker to crush the united forces of the enemy, and carry the war into their own country, if he be inclined to punish their insolent and unprovoked aggression, or extend still further the boundaries of his young republic. The Red Star is culminating to the point whence it will shine forth a guiding light to all the oppressed of Central America. Long may it blaze on the banners of the liberated state.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE PRESS.

The law holds the editor of a newspaper responsible for any libellous matter that may appear in his columns, and exacts a commensurate penalty. The Press is legally, morally and honorably accountable for what it publishes. But as matter may appear in a newspaper of a personal and offensive character—which the law cannot take hold of—the injured party is naturally driven to seek redress according to that code which is older than the statutes, more venerable than the common law, and is recognised by every high-toned gentleman. We don't see why editorial poltroonery should be allowed to shield itself behind the assumed privileges of the Press, while it assails private character and brings grief and sorrow into many homes. Where the code of honor is observed, the newspaper Press stands higher, and Society itself puts on a more dignified and chivalrous bearing. If a man deliberately writes down and circulates a vile slander, he has no right to dictate to to the injured person the mode of redress which he should have recourse to. It is contemptible to hear parties laying down the law in such matters, and appealing for protection to what they term civilized society, while their writings betray anything but civilization, decorum, or common decency. For our own part, we write nothing for which we do not hold ourselves personally responsible.

MR. MEAGHER'S LECTURE.

Thomas Francis Meagher delivered a lecture at the Tabernacle on Monday night, for the benefit of the widow and daughter of the late Captain Kerrigan. The audience—numbering about three thousand persons—was, perhaps, the most brilliant ever assembled within the walls of that building. The wealth, the beauty and chivalry of the city were fully represented.

We observed the following military companies in attendance: The City Horse Guards and Guyon Cadets, Ninth Regiment, the Emmet Guards, 10th, the Irish Dragoons, Fag-a-bealac Guards, Brian Boroihme Guards, and the Emmet Life Guards, (of the 69th). The Napper Tandy Light Artillery, (70th Regiment,) the officers of the Seventy-fifth, the Irish News Guard, and Patrick Henry Guard.

On the motion of the Hon. John Cochrane, the Hon. John Kelly was called upon to preside. After a brief address he introduced Mr. Meagher to the audience. The lecture referred to the contrasts between Republicanism and Monarchy, Europe and America, and occupied nearly two hours in its delivery.

News from Nicaragua—Letter from Lieut. Nagle.

Just as we go to press, we receive a most interesting letter from this gallant young officer. His account of the fight at Massaya and the rout of the enemy from Granada is intensely graphic. From his own words—and those who know Michael Nagle are aware that he is the last man in the world to exaggerate his own merits—we perceive that he has already done all we promised for him. His was a foremost, effective, and fearless part in both engagements. He writes in the best health and spirits—bears testimony to the gallant daring of several of those who accompanied him from New-York—and sends fondest remembrances to his groups of friends.

His letter shall appear in full next week.

Convent-Searching in New Orleans.

We perceive by the New Orleans Delta of the 7th inst., that the Mayor of New Orleans, acting upon the information of one of his police, has been imitating the despotism, bigotry, and intolerance of the Massachusetts Know-Nothings, who violated the sanctity of conventual life last year in Boston. Under the plea of searching for arms and munitions of war in the Charity Hospital, a batch of police visited that institution, and proceeded even to ransack the private apartments of the Nuns. It is time that a stop should be put, in this free country, to such insolent intrusion.

RELICS OF THE REVOLUTION.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 3, 1856.

Sitting in one of the parlors of the Girard House, and in the midst of excitements having their origin in the discussion of those political issues upon which the People will express their decision to-morrow—with the clear manly voice of Kenneth Raynor, of North Carolina, in my ears, attempting in vain to incite a select few of his fellow Know-Nothings to abandon the Chief of that faction, and to fuse with the party, to check the progress of which they were, at first, called into existence—with the calm, thoughtful, massive head of ex-Senator Truman Smith, the particular counsellor of the Republican candidate before me, whose mind, more suited for Cabinet consultation than Congressional effect, was, no doubt, deeply occupied in the consideration of the probable success of some political suggestion connected with the coming strife—with these and other objects of attraction (or distraction) partially engaging my attention, a thought was suggested by the sight of a bust of Franklin. Why not devote this day, it occurred to me, in a pilgrimage to the graves of the most eminent of those whose patriotism and valor achieved our Independence and created a Nation; and whose wisdom and virtue gave form and stability to that independence by the Constitution of '87, to the operations of which alone is to be ascribed the fact of a People ascending, in the comparatively short period of seventy-two years, from a situation in which scarcely any other nation would have dreamt of Freedom through self-reliance. At any time the thought would have been to me irresistible—but now it assumed the shape of duty. Now that that People were arrayed in two great geographical sections against each other, striving not against a foreign enemy, but each for the mastery on questions of public weal, the policy of which had been defined and settled at the laying of the foundations of the Union—now, when civil strife exists, raging and menacing that Union, I should go to those localities associated with the name and labors of the Fathers of the Republic!

Would that the Nation may return to seek the original sources from whose vitality it received the strong impulse which has directed and borne it hitherto in its course of success, and by which it is expanding through a continent with an energy and force unexampled in the history of the human race—subduing the farthest recesses of nature, and filling the wilderness with the beneficent fruits of Civilization and Christianity.

I had on former occasions visited Carpenter's Hall, 3rd and 4th streets, a few yards from Chestnut street, where, in 1775, the Continental Congress—in secret session—first sat; where John Adams first invoked the spirit that was destined at no distant day to annihilate monarchical prejudices, and to revolutionize empires, and poured forth that flood of reason and patriotism which the genius of Webster has labored to portray to us, and before which went down, in that Congress, the fallacies of the sophist. It pained me when I saw that this, the real birth-place of American liberty, had not been preserved and set apart with that pious reverence that preserves and sets apart the Hall of Independence. But few visitors go there. It has been allowed to degenerate into an Auction Store—and when I visited it last, it was filled with a crowd of people attending to the purchase of the stock in trade of a bankrupt collection of Italian curiosities, and other works of Art. This building is nearly in its original state—more so than the Hall of Independence, and the room where the Congress sat (except by its present occupation) has suffered no change. Washington and Patrick Henry were men of that Congress—they were not members of the Convention of 1776, from which the immortal Declaration emanated.

Leaving Carpenter's Hall, a minute's walk brought me to the corner of Market and Fourth Streets. It is a place where few visitors go. It is an old building—originally a dwelling-house; the first floor of it has recently been changed into a shop, and the the second story is occupied by a vender of Yankee Notions! Yet few localities have more claims upon the attention of the visitor, and on few others will the young Republican (American or European), upon whose soul the light of Liberty has beamed, gaze with deeper feelings and veneration, and, I will say, awe. And why? Because, in that room, on that second story, to the windows of which are those old wooden shutters, Jefferson drafted that immortal Declaration. During the sittings of the Convention, he occupied that room, and where Franklin, Roger Sherman, John Adams, and Daw, to whom the duty of preparing the draft was committed, held their deliberations. In my mind's eye I witnessed the scenes that had transpired in that room, as pictured to us by a member of that committee. Jefferson reading the draft as prepared by him to his fellow-members—Adams impetuously dictating, dogmatically persisting in verbal amendments—Jefferson restraining his warm nature, and Franklin smoothing down the asperities of the contention.

I had now been at the spot where the "ball of the Revolution was first set in motion," and where the Declaration was prepared, and it remained to extend my pilgrimage to the Hall where the Delegates from all parts of the country—from the North and the South, the East and the West—were convened; and where each, pledging "their lives, fortunes, and sacred honors" to the principles enunciated in that document, sent it forth in the cool of the morn of the Republican cause. The history and architectural appearance of Independence Hall is too widely known for mention here. This building is seldom neglected by visitors; it is of so great resort that the City Council have been obliged to have a person there in daily attendance for convenience of access. I have been frequently there, but I felt a desire to go once again and see an object which always had interest to me. Among the relics preserved in the Hall, is a broken window-stone. It lies on a pedestal, at the feet of "Pater Patria," and an inscription charactered thereon informs the reader, that, standing on that stone, the Secretary of the Convention, on the 4th July, 1776, read to the people the Declaration which assured them that the colonial yoke was to be borne no longer, and that they were a nation. The Secretary was Charles Thompson, an Irishman.

I saw the broken window-stone again, and I think I learned a truer scheme of American policy and a higher theme for American eloquence, this day, from the sermon in that stone, than from the fierce and indiscriminate denunciation of the itinerant orator of North Carolina.

Having here finished my visits to the buildings which the acts of the Fathers of the Republic make conspicuous, I moved my steps to the tombs wherein they are quietly inurned; and of these I shall say something another time. L.

COLUMBIAN MILITARY AND LITERARY ASSOCIATION OF BOSTON.

At the close of his lecture before this Association, last week, Mr. Meagher delivered the following remarks:—

GENTLEMEN:—The duty you honored me with an invitation to perform has been brought to a close, and I have now only to express my respectful acknowledgment of the distinction you conferred, and my sincere thanks for the cordial attention with which you heard and favored me. Permit me, in doing so, to remined you, that immediately upon the notification of your wishes, I assured you of my willingness to comply with the request your Secretary did me the honor to communicate. This disposition on my part was eager; liberal as my limited means would permit; prompt as other engagements would suffer it to be. It was thus eager, liberal, and prompt, from the knowledge I had acquired of the origin, character, and object of the Association you constitute. Wherever I know that a grievous injustice has been done my countrymen, native or adopted, I feel irresistibly impelled to take their part. Wherever I know that imputations, derogatory of their truth, probity, courage and fidelity as citizens, have been uttered, my irrepressible impuse is, has alway been, and ever shall be, to repel the calumny, and resent the outrage. And it required few, if any, inquiries, for me to understand, and be thoroughly convinced, that the gentlemen whom I have now the privilege to address, had been subjected to such treatment as I have intimated. It was a notorious fact—a fact announced with official consequence from the Council Chamber of this State—that every company of the State Militia, presumed to consist of citizens born elsewhere than in America, was disarmed and dismissed the service of the Commonwealth. With a labored eloquence, which augmented its publicity, this fact was made known to the four winds by the Chief Magistrate of Massachusetts. Instantaneously the telegraph communicated it to the thirty-two points of the compass. Simultaneously almost, the fifty thousand papers which enlighten the mind of the country, multiplied its notoriety by the column, the paragraph, by all the letters of the alphabet indefinitely combined, and by many choice words not to be found even in the best edition of Webster's dictionary. Some approved—others condemned—some spared the rod—others damned with faint praise. Between them Governor Gardner acquired a publicity for his proscriptive edict which no other act of his, before or since, has had, for better orfor worse, the infelicity or blessing to achieve. The Bee — his stinging organ — contributed its mellifluous hum to the rising storm, and in the midst of it accumulated no small stock of honey from the thistle of discontent. The London Times, which has an ink-bottle deep and black as the bottomless pit—to furnish profane knowledge with to all the world, and which—the most insatiate bully that ever lived—busies itself with every quarrel that breaks out under the sun—the London Times assisted the Boston Bee—and with its hipopotamus roar compensated for the delicate intonations of its fragile cotemporary. Which being the case, there was no necessity for me, as I have said, to inquire whether or not it was the case, that you, gentlemen, officers and privates of the Columbian Artillery of the Massachusetts Militia, had been most ungraciously, most offensively, most intolerantly dealt with. Knowing that you had been so dealt with—America learning it—Europe, Australia, the world hearing of it—I felt eager to identify myself with you, and from such a position as you have assigned me this evening to congratulate you on the spirit which had convoked, inspired with strength, and imparted dignity to this Association of citizens, gentlemen, and soldiers.

Though sorely tempted to animadvert upon the act of the Governor who declared you unworthy to bear arms in the service of the State—who in doing so has eminently rivalled those statesmen and Pro-consuls, who, year after year, for centuries, have systematically disarmed and then as systematically coerced the Irish race at home—disabling and then despoiling—reducing to ignominious weakness, so that they might with impunity instigate to madness—crippling the strong man so that they might put out his eyes and put him to drudge as a slave; though sorely tempted to remind him that in doing what he has been guilty of in your regard, he has in an excessive measure returned evil for good, requiting loyalty by a merciless ingratitude, branding the arms which under his predecessor, at a momentous period, were prompt to sustain the magistracy, the laws, the good order of this city, and the fundamental provisions of the Constitution, and that in depriving you of your legitimate weapons on the ground of your Irish birth, the blood which flows in your veins, and the faith which as an inextinguishable fire from Heaven burns in your souls, he has to all intents and purposes denied the authenticity of the most glorious portions of the American annals—those which commemorate the assault upon Quebec, where Montgomery fell—those which commemorate the crossing of the Delaware, in which the Irish Regiment of Pennsylvania, under Walker, made their way not in boats nor on rafts, but leaping from fragment to fragment of the broken ice — those which commemorate the field of Cerro Gordo, where James Shields was pierced through and through, from breast-bone to spine; though sorely tempted to remind the Governer of Massachusetts—this potentate of penal edicts—of these and other illustrious circumstances, the lesson taught by which he disregards with such a bigoted insensibility, and though provoked to ask him with a haughty confidence, when and where did the Irish born citizens of America, in arms for the Republic, prove recreant to their trust—when and where did their hearts fail them under its inviolable ensigns—when and where did their bounding blood turn cold—when and where did they refuse impetuously to follow with their bayonets the flashing signal of their captain—when and where did they slink from their post, conspire with the enemy, and sell the pass; though sorely tempted to do all this, I shall be silent. Other times have come.

I shall not think of apologizing to citizens who have been proscribed—who have been pronounced unworthy to bear arms in the service of the State—any political allusion I consider it seasonable to make. I shall not apologize for the congratulations I offer them on the good fortune which to their race, their creed, and citizenship has resulted from the great contest for the Presidency. Other times, I say, have come. Governor Gardiner may cultivate a plant of stunted growth and bitter leaves, but a tree of stately growth strikes its roots deep into the soil of Pennsylvania, stretches its arms to the North and to the South, to the East and to the West—sheltering the children of every clime who come to it, and in the profusion of its foliage and the vigor of its limbs attesting, that whilst bigotry is but a sour shrub and found only in regions manured with the bones of Witches, liberty—liberty of conscience, of creed, of worship—liberty and citizenship to all men, no matter from whence they come—is the American oak, the strength, beauty, worth, and majesty of which find increase with its years. This sour shrub—this bitter black dwarf—shall be plucked up from the republican soil of America, and be dealt with as the barren fig tree; whilst the giant of the forest towers above it—excels it in all things, and for all time survives it!

HIS ADVENTURES IN AMERICA.

CHAPTER X.

Conclusion.

TOM CASSIDEY AND THE PRIEST — AN ANXIOUS INTERVIEW AND EXPLANATION — "ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL."

"Oh Time! thou beautifier of the dead—
Adorner of the ruin—comforter
And only healer when the heart hath bled—
Time! the corrector when our judgments err—
The test of truth, love,—sole philosopher!"

BYRON.

ONCE MORE IN IRELAND.

It is a bright December day in the fall of the same year which witnessed the sudden death of Burrowes O'Reilly and the emigration of his son. The snow has fallen to an unusual depth, but the sun shines radiantly above, and the brown streaks which seam the landscape announce that a brisk thaw has already set in upon the highroads and open slopes.

The cottage of Father Casement — to which we have to beg the reader's company—stood on a narrow strip of meadow land between the river and the village; and from the windows of its little cosy parlor, a full view could be had of the mansion house of Castleronan, to which a private path had been opened during the life-time of the former occupant.

Father Casement had wheeled his chair back so that from where he sat he could command a full view of the path and house; and the random answers which he gave to his companion, and the eager glances which he repeatedly sent across the snow, alike proclaimed that his mind was otherwise occupied, and in momentary expectation of beholding some event in which he took the liveliest interest.

On the other side of the fire sat Tom Cassidey, the village attorney, who had spent some hours in an attempt to obtain from the Priest a consistent account of discoveries which aroused all his professional ardor, but which, with all his acuteness, he was as yet unable to comprehend. Tom was dressed in a suit of professional black, with a white neck-tie, and drab gaiters buttoned well up above his knees; his face was florid, his eyes like two gray opals with a diamond set in the heart of each, and such thin white locks as still remained around the base of his head, were gathered back in a queue which stood out at an uncompromising angle above his collar. On the whole, for an attorney, his appearance was decidedly in his favor; the cunning which lurked in the wrinkles round his mouth was counteracted by the genial candor of his features when regarded as a whole, and an observant physiognomist would have agreed with the Priest, that "whether as a friend or foe, Tom Cassidey was not the man to have a lukewarm heart."

"I suppose," said Father Casement, turning round once more to the fire, "I suppose we must look on his staying there so long as a good sign. If he and Matthew hadn't come to some kind of terms, we'd have seen him on his way back here before this. Just touch that bell, Tom," continued he, "and let us have some more hot water. Not another look I'll take along the pathway, till I see his shadow on the window-pane, for the more I look for him the longer he'll be sure to stay."

"Two very excellent resolves, my friend," replied the attorney; "for another tumbler, such a cold day as we have of it, is not to be despised; and to aid you in not looking, if you'll allow me, I'll draw the curtain?"

"Do so—do so; anxiety only grows by what it feeds on. I have every confidence in my nephew's moderation, but Matthew's temper has been so soured by the fearful injustice of which he was so many years the victim, that I can never know a moment's peace until the result of this interview is ascertained."

"I wish you would let me know the rights of it," exclaimed the attorney, fidgetting in his chair and handing back his empty tumbler to be filled. "I understand that Matthew was unjustly condemned for a double murder, which was, in fact, a murder and a suicide — the lady he lived with having killed the man whose attentions laid her open to suspicion, after which she made away with herself in a way so unusual as strongly to favor the imputation of foul play. But after the lapse of so many years, and without any clue to guide him, how did Casement recognize his uncle in the person convicted of such crimes under the name of Matthew Mowbray? or how could he have obtained that perfect proof of Matthew's innocence which has induced the law-officers of the crown — of the state, I mean — to confess that the verdict of 'guilty' was a fatal error? This is the part which bothers me and gives the whole transaction a cast of the miraculous ——"

"Miraculous you may well say," interposed the Priest with solemn earnestness; "for if ever the hand of God was made visible in these latter days to correct the errors of human judgment, it has been made so here. When I review the whole chain of agencies which conducted Casement to the very farm house where the supposed murders had been committed, and there revealed to him the letter, intended for his uncle, in which the unhappy woman confessed the deed already done and announced her intention of the suicide which followed,—when I recall the fact that this letter must have escaped the scrutiny of thousands attracted to the premises by the horrible fascination of great guilt, and that it was literally thrown at my nephew's feet by the fall of a clock which commenced striking as if to emphasize the close of a long day, — and when we add to this the strange coincidence of Ned Morgan's kidnapping, through which the chain of evidence was unconsciously completed,—taking all these things into account, I say, he must indeed be a most hardened sceptic who will refuse to recognize the finger of Divine interposition."

"What kind of a lawyer could Matthew have had, to allow such a letter to pass unnoticed?"

"He must have been an omadhawn," replied the priest, giving way to a smile at the attorney's professional excitement. "Matthew, it must be confessed, seems a poor judge of legal timber; for if he had studied his own interest, would he have dispensed, since his return, with the services of Mr. Thomas Cassidey—a gentleman, of whose eminent abilities, Tom, your friends sometimes weary of hearing you expatiate"

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed the attorney, "that is a fair hit, and I own it was fairly earned. But tell me—for in truth it puzzles me—how did a letter of this importance escape detection for so many years?"

"She must have placed it against the dial of the clock, thinking that in that position it could not fail to be seen. But somehow, it slipped down out of sight between the woodwork and the glass, and as the house lay untenanted until a dare-devil called Brand came back and claimed it as the property of Mowbray's—that is, Matthew's—son, it might have remained there till eternity, had not the will of Heaven decided otherwise. The fact is that poor Matthew was paralyzed by the position in which he found himself. He employed no counsel on his own behalf, and either would not, or could not, give any save a total and strenuous denial of the offences charged, to the counsel appointed by the court. He was a stranger, without friends, in a strange land; and as telling his true name and rank could only have cast an additional slur upon his family, he preferred, I suppose—and I cannot deny that I honor him for the resolution—to suffer whatever might be his fate in silence."

"It's a wonder they didn't hang him, if he had no friends, and would give no account of his antecedents."

"It would indeed be wonderful, were we not well assured that Providence protects the innocent. But what can be keeping Casement so long? It is his first interview with his uncle—for you know he only returned the day before yesterday—and I await the upshot of these disclosures with fear and trembling."

"Then had Matthew no idea of his business before he called?"

"None, save a very affectionate note, couched in the most delicate and guarded language, in which Casement stated that he had been absent for some weeks, in America, and had chanced on a discovery in which his uncle, he felt sure, would take the deepest and most joyful interest."

"And what was the reply? Such an intimation must have alarmed him beyond measure."

"There came no written answer, but Jenkinson, his man of business—your successor, Tom—came over here, and after an unsuccessful attempt to pump out the secret, to-day—Christmas eve—was appointed for the decisive interview. Remember, Tom, I only tell you these things in confidence, and as the family solicitor. Should Matthew not prove intractable to reason, they must be buried and passed over as if they had never been."

"Then what induced him to pass off those children as his own, for personally he does not seem to like them? He christened them 'the brats' on the first day of his arrival; and the epithet, like one of O'Connell's, has stuck like bird-lime."

"They are not his children," replied the priest, rising up as if no longer able to control his anxiety, and pulling back the curtain. "Well, well," he exclaimed, "not a sign of him yet, and it will soon be growing dark. Let us hope, however, that the length of the interview is a proof of its mutual satisfaction."

"But if they are not his children, what could induce him to place cuckoos eggs in the family nest?"

"They have not a drop of his blood in them; but he undoubtedly believes them to be his grand-children. And as their father—as he imagines—died in procuring his liberation, it was a generous impulse, though a wrong one, which prompted him to undertake that father's place."

"But how, my dear fellow? Explain yourself, for the thing sounds like a romance."

"Ah, Tom, need I tell you that there are romances in real life which would be set down as gross and impudent exaggerations, if the novelist were to attempt to use them? But it certainly is odd," he went on, again returning to the window, and pulling back the certain with a nervous hand, "that Casement should remain so long."

"Sit down, sit down, my dear sir," urged Tom Cassidy, placing his hands on the priest's shoulders and playfully pushing him back into the chair. "The longer you look for him the longer he'll be, and I'm dying, meantime, to have the history of the children."

"Well, since I must, I must; but touch the bell again and let's have some more hot water. When Matthew was imprisoned, and under sentence of death, a son he had by the lady for whose supposed murder he was about to suffer, was taken away by a rapparee called Brand, and brought up in a wild kind of way on the debatable land between Mexico and the United States. This son grew up to manhood, and formed a connexion with the woman whom your sagacity rightly presumed to be the mother of Matthew's 'brats.'"

"Phew," whistled the attorney, "then they're a kind of left-handed grand-children, after all!"

"No more than you are, sir," replied the priest, with energy; "they are the children of a Mexican, called Pedro de Cascales, who had been arrested and condemned to the galleys some time before the lady took up with her second lover. It seems that young Mowbray, as he was styled, forgot all about his origin, until the facts were recalled to him by an old Indian smuggler to whom they had been related by Brand nearly twenty years before. Passing through such a channel, you may be sure the tale did not lack a very lavish embellishment; and Mathew's son now learned for the first time that his father had been an English gentleman of enormous wealth—so ran the story—who had been imprisoned for life for various murders, but who had undoubtedly secreted a vast fortune somewhere before his arrest, as not a penny could be afterwards found, though he had hitherto lived in a sumptuous country palace on Long Island!

"Actuated by the hope of this reward, or, perhaps—let us hope—by some nobler instinct of filial love, the son at once determined to set his father free, if he were still alive. In order to induce his chère amie to accompany him in his Northern pilgrimage, he represented the riches which must be theirs in case of success, and that determined her to share his enterprise. They arrived in New-York, accompanied by the children, who, for convenience sake, were passed as young Mowbray's own.

"The son procured some interviews with his father, who, on account of his long confinement and calm endurance of the inevitable evil, had been allowed many privileges; they arranged a plan of escape, and settled that after quitting the prison precincts they would separate for greater safety, and meet again at the house which had been hired for the Señora. The plan succeeded so far as the prisoner was concerned; but young Mowbray was observed lurking under the outside walls, by one of the keepers, who, thinking him a prisoner attempting to escape, first called on him to stand, and then fired with an aim too fatal. The ball went crashing through his brain.

"Mathew, who was not aware of this, reached the rendezvous in safety, and waited impatiently for his son's appearance. He knew that the Señora was his son's wife or mistress, and naturally concluded that the children were also his—a belief which the lady, more especially when she heard of her lover's death, took every means to play upon and encourage.

"Actuated, I suppose, by a generous gratitude, Matthew determined to adopt them as his own and take them back with him to Ireland. A subscription was somehow set on foot, to which the bankers contributed; and as he could not use the name of Mowbray, and would not allow such a woman as the mother of his son's children showed herself, to know his real name, he adopted that of Cascales, and under that designation returned to France."

"You delight me—you astonish me—you amaze me!" exclaimed Tom Cassidy, in an ecstasy of professional admiration; "not a silk gown of them all could make a clearer statement! But how did the Señora find him out here, if he was so anxious to conceal himself?"

"Who can resist a woman's cunning," replied Father Casement, with a smile. "She gave an envelope addressed to herself to the eldest 'brat,' instructing him to post it whenever he should arrive at what appeared to be his journey's end. This envelope had the postmark 'Castleronan, Ireland,' and when she arrived here a few inquiries only were needed to point out the gentleman who had returned from long foreign travel."

"I wonder she trusted him out of her sight at all! Still more the children ——"

"Pshaw, man, they were only an incumbrance she was glad to get rid of on any terms. Besides she couldn't help herself; he promised her wealth if she would allow him to go alone, but declared that, rather than take her, he would surrender himself to the authorities. You see she had no alternative; and so she apparently placed confidence in his word, while secretly employing her elder child as a spy."

"It is a tangled web altogether; but what has become of her?"

"Oh! with the three thousand pounds which Matthew sent her, she procured the liberation of her first lover, and together they engaged in a very laudable enterprise of which Casement will tell you more."

"And as I live by bread," exclaimed the attorney, who had been standing at the window for some time, "here is your nephew coming across the meadows. But who can his companion be? His figure is so muffled in that cloak, that I cannot distinguish it, except that it is not Jenkinson."

"Joy, joy!" cried the priest, clasping his hands together, while the tears streamed down his furrowed cheeks. "It is the right owner of Castleronan, and the rightful heir of the O'Reillys, walking arm and arm. Oh, Burrowes, your death-words were, indeed, prophetic! Oh, sister, your dying fears were vain!"

* * * * * * * *

Little more remains to be told. Casement soon after took a second trip to America—ostensibly for the purpose of settling some small annuity on the Señora, whose silence it was deemed most prudent to secure; but he had really a much dearer and more delightful object, which the reader, if possessed of any sensibility, will not be slow to guess.

Before his return, however, he received a visit from the father of Lady Alice, who seemed anxious to impress on him the fact that nothing but the most rigorous coercion on his (the father's) part, had produced the seeming change in sentiment which had been painfully apparent in the conduct of Casement's affianced bride.

"I thank you, my lord," returned our hero, coldly—"but I have not forgotten the lesson 'on the different gradations of society' which the Lady Alice, your daughter, was good enough to read me at our last meeting. I am about to return to America, and shall probably be absent for some months. When I return here, it will be in company with one for whose happy inexperience of society I would bespeak your daughter's compassionate and sisterly regard."

Ned Morgan is happily settled and thriving beside his father-in-law in Illinois. He was anxious to return to Ireland; but it would never do to have one sister in the mansion, and the other in the game-keeper's lodge. Besides, McCarthy made his consent conditional on Anne's remaining, and Mr. O'Grady's picture of "manifest advantages,"—as comprised in the marriage settlements—was not without due weight.

Squinting Dick escaped, but only for a time. His peculia talents were so prominent, that he has been engaged under very strong security, to do "the State some service," for the period of fifteen years. Mr. G. W. Brand is still, we believe, at large, and has taken to the honorable profession of peripatetic philanthropy. He seldom visits New-York, however; but in "the rural districts," under a Reverend alias, his ministrations have been most effectual.

THE END.

AILEY MOORE—A NEW IRISH STORY.

AILEY MOORE—A Tale of the Times; showing how Evictions, Murder, and such-like Pastimes, are managed, and Justice administered in Ireland. Together with many stirring incidents in other lands. By FATHER BAPTIST. 2 vols. Dunnigan & Brother, (J. B. Kirker.)

The very full title-page of this work indicates the nature of the contents of these volumes, and prepares the reader for the concomitants of the "feast of reason and the flow of blood" with which he is, according to his taste, to be entertained or excited. All Irish stories, even those professedly of a lively nature, draw much of their dramatic character from the misfortunes which surround the cabins of the peasantry; and while the political novelist seeks beneath their tottering roof-trees, and around their chill hearths for the inspiration that gives a withering force to his pathos and a vengeful eloquence to his patriotism, the lighter story-teller instances from and upon the same premises, the native vitality of the race, which apparently no proscription can bow, no religious persecution degrade, no variety of labor exhaust.

Exterior pressure seems futile to crush out the indigenous vivacity, love, and humor of the Irish peasant. These are things resistless as the elements. Unchainable as the air or the ocean, and as ever varying. In their very variety they are recuperative, and support each other as the seasons of the year.

Whether this "fatal facility" for self-content—whether this marvellous power of holding within one's self the ceaseless capacity of making misery bearable to those to whom it is an atmosphere; and a thing of comical reminiscences to those who go among the Irish peasantry—whether this is a benefit to the Irish race, or any other people so constituted, or otherwise, is a question of deep and serious import, and one upon which hinges a world of political speculations, which would be as much out of place in a critical notice of a fiction as in the fiction itself. The question, however, would not be uninteresting as a subject for suggestive discourse in some of our young men's debating societies.

"Ailey Moore" is in fact a religious treatise, made interesting for general perusal by the interweaving of a touching though desultorily conducted story; or perhaps we should say by the grafting of a clever series of sketches, dove-tailed together, so as to be secondary, and at the same time lead the reader anxiously to the author's primal desire. There is a great deal of character in the performance, and the dramatis personæ embrace many admirably drawn figures. Shaun na Dhirk, who is the great motive power of the story, and good father Mick Quinlivan, who is the beautiful representative of the Catholic feeling and principle of the work, are distinct and recognizable people. Ailey Moore herself reminds us strongly of Mary Martin in Lever's last work. She is held in the same veneration and love by the peasantry. Her kindness to them is the same. Her watchfulness as unceasing, and her confidence in them as great. Ailey is a more fragile though not less delicate being. She has not the dashing characteristics of her bright and loveable Galway sister, (for they are of the same family of angels upon earth.) Ailey, moreover, is a Catholic, and in that faith finds all her strength. It is her inspiration, her resource, her hope. The chief point of difference between Father Baptist's and Mr. Lever's heroine is in the happy fate of that of the former. Her troubles and her goodnesses are rewarded by a good husband, and she lives happy. Another character which strikes us forcibly as an ambrotype from the Cro' Martin gallery is our author's Joyce Snapper, the attorney and land agent. He is the counterpart of Lever's Joe Scanlan. The likeness extends even to the gig and horseflesh of each. The one, as the other, is a low-bred, consequential, sneaking, audacious, time-serving rascal, though for the credit of the Galway attorney we must say, he never descended to be the accomplice of murderers. Like Mr. Scanlan, Mr. Snapper, under a similar routine of circumstances, aspires to the hand of the heroine; and in his chagrin, and self-complacent might of power and purse, very strongly resembles the former person.

Biddy Browne, the beggarwoman, and her grandson Eddy, are to the life. The reverend and angelical pair, Mr. and Mrs. Salmer, (for, as the author says, they cannot be separated) are full lengths which we cannot pass by without contemplating, as they are leading representatives of the principle, or want of principle, against which Father Baptist has written his work. Look at them:

The Rev. Joram Salmer, was a man of four or five and thirty, and might, for all the world could pronounce, be five, or even ten years older. He was very thin, lank, and tall, with hands and arms which swung to and fro as he walked, as if they did not know what on earth brought them where they were, and would willingly part companionship with their owner. A most unexceptionable cravat of pure white, bore up his chin. His mouth was very huge, his nose very straight and high, his small black eyes made perpetual but vain efforts not to look cunning; devotion seemed to them a continuous drill, and all were fixed upon a face so wan and parchment like, that it was an oppression of weakness for such nose, and eyes, and mouth to quarter themselves upon it.

Mrs. Joram Salmer, of whom we speak with great respect and fear—every one feared Mrs. Salmer—Mrs. Joram Salmer was a fitting partner for perfection like that of her lord. She was very long, like him, and had many of his facial and general traits. Her ears, it was remarkable, were very far behind, and her nose far and pointedly before; in fact, they looked as if antagonist powers had been drawing them in different directions. Her eyes were large, and of no color that we ever heard of; but they always seemed in a trembling balance upon the two ends of a beam; and her mouth was kept quite rigid, unless when she spoke, when the size of the under lip showed that it had been kept under severe discipline. Now this face, haloed round by a crimped, close, fair muslin border, and surmounted by a large cylindrical-looking cap, was quite satisfactory to Mr. Salmer, and we question whether enemies' remarks thereon can be at all justified. Biddy Browne contended that there was no such face for spoiling a handsome bonnet, but we protest against any paticipation in the remarks or evil judgings of any parties who did not esteem Mrs. Joram Salmer as she esteemed herself, wherewith we proceed with our story.

To this pair was entrusted the evangelizing of the peasantry of Kinmacarra, a proceeding which had been either too much for, or grievously neglected by their predecessors in that locality.

Gerald Moore, who may be taken as the hero, is another illustration of the principle that guides and supports his sister Ailey. The chief interest centres on him, inasmuch as innocence and manly virtue, triumphantly struggling against the wiles and plots of villainy, always demands our deepest emotions and most anxious sympathies. So much for the leading characters.

The author avows himself a clergyman, and considering his purpose, may be excused for the minor defects of his labor of love. He takes occasion—on rather slim pretences—of taking the reader into his confidence touching the politics of Rome. He also exalts to saintship Louis Napoleon and Eugenie, and visits with curt, but wholesale anathema, some noted leaders of the European revolutions. We suppose the author, like other people, is entitled to his opinion, but we doubt his taste in marring the excellence of the work by such ebullitions of furious praise and condemnation. He writes admirably—sometimes brilliantly, and always exhibits an ease, force, freshness, and point, rarely to be encountered. The book is decidedly attractive, and will be read with much pleasure for its manner alone.

"ALL'S FAIR IN LOVE."

Yes! "all's fair in love, law, and electioneering." So we have heard, so we have been taught, and so we have seen verified a thousand times. Moralists may not sanction this popular adage. But let the moralist once get into the Court of Cupid, the Court of Chancery, or the Presidential canvass Court, and his casuistry may probably yield and give way to the promptings of human nature, which some one has waggishly termed, "a rascal all over the world." Love rules alike in every clime and condition of society. It is seductive in the cottage, irresistible in the court, and, even in the camp, the stern warriors do it unfeigned homage.

"ALL'S FAIR IN LOVE," is the title of a new play—not yet published—which has dropped from the gifted and facile pen of John Brougham. When Brougham writes or acts, every one is prepared to receive a rich treat.

Graceful, natural, artistic, on the stage;
Vivid, humorous, and pungent, on the page.

The plot is well laid and pleasingly developed, without any of that straining of the parts, which jars upon the mind of an audience and destroys the effect of many plays which, in other particulars, possess a high order of merit. There is a pleasing grouping of the characters, an artistic arrangement of the principal incidents and persons, which cannot fail to render this play highly popular when brought out by an extensive company. There is a hero and a heroine—who ever saw play without those important characters?—a hero and a heroine, we say, who appear pretty much like all such characters. They are, however, more than ordinary specimens of that respectable class, and can, by a clever delineator, be made to play their parts as if they were not acting. There are some characters so drawn, and so far removed from their proper spheres, that even the best actors feel it impossible to impart a touch of the real or natural to the parts they perform.

Count —— is enamored of Eva; his love is secret, pure, and fervid. Eva is the daughter of Herman, the huntsman of the Count. Young Eva, with a woman's heart, a woman's affection, sincerity and devotion, also secretly returns the passion. There is a magnetic connection between hearts which unite the affections—an unseen, an unknown, an undefinable attraction which none but the Searcher of Hearts can solve. Bertha, the sister of Eva, with that keenness of perception which, in such tender matters, peculiarly belongs to the gentler sex, discovers the attachment of Eva for the Count, and resolves to ascertain if her passion—that imponderable fluid of the affections—had permeated the heart of the Count. Bearing a most striking resemblance to her brother—who is the Count's page—she dons his attire and waits upon the Count, and tells him that Otto, one of his huntsmen, was paying his addresses to Eva. The intelligence at once struck the right chord. A flash of jealousy burst forth, and he declared that he would not permit the marriage. However, after a fierce conflict with his feelings, he resolves, in a moment of hot pride, to ask the hand of Ida, the daughter of Baron Altenburg. Bertha brings the message, in her assumed capacity of page, and Ida at first refuses the proffered hand, but finally consents, at the command of her father. Bertha returns disappointed and crest-fallen; but while she was absent the chief huntsman had been thrown from his horse and, believing himself to be about closing his accounts with all sublunary affairs, he tells Eva that she was not his daughter, but the child of Baron Altenburg—that she had been sent to his wife to be nursed, who substituted her own for the Baron's. The reputed daughter of the Baron dies, and the Count is next introduced in company with Eva, telling the tale of his love. Eva does not disclose to him her real position, but allows him to woo her as the huntsman's gudarteh. At this connection, Bertha returns with the message of Ida, accepting the Count's offer, but he declines and vows to wed Eva. In the last act, lady Eva is restored to her father and meets the Count in the baronial hall. He does not recognize her, with her deep veil and rich attire, and believing that she is Ida, declares his love for the huntsman's daughter, breaks off the match, and is about to fly to the peasant's cot and marry Eva. When, lo! the veil drops, the Baron joins their hands, and the curtain falls upon the happy lovers. There are a couple of under-plots which fill up the entire piece, and complete what cannot fail to be a most interesting and popular play.

THE LAST BROTHER.

Faint lay the boyish clusters of his hair,
With a chill shadow deepening on their gold;
Around the marble brow and placid cheek,
And o'er the crimson of the curved lip,
The pallid death came settling shade by shade,
Swimming along the azure of his eyes
That drooped within their lids, and ope'd no more;
The parted lips relapsed into a smile—
And he was dead.

Reverb'rant shut the passless gates of life;
Without the closed portals, lone we stand.
Our clasped palms eloquent in silent prayer.
And dost thou send no sign? O lured, and lost!
Hast thou not seen, through all thy nights of pain,
Through the swift darkness closing round thy way,
Thy sisters' souls go with thee to the shades?
The last faint clasp is loosed, and thou art gone,
With thine unsandaled feet upon the path,
So dread and dark, where we can follw not.
Would we not fling this clinging life away,
Even as a faded festal robe, to share
The path that thou must tread companionless?

On what wild shore thou leavest us alone—
An unknown shore that stretches wide and dim—
Watching the latest ripple of the tide,
That swift and dark bears thee from us for aye.
And where will be thy gentle hand to guide
O'er rocks and treacherous sands, our feeble steps,
Trembling at every shadow on the shore?
Thou beautiful! can Hades wait for thee?
Thine was no vulgar being, where the clay
Quenches in some rude mould the captive soul;
But like an antique statue, formed and wrought
With all the divine symmetry of limb
The Grecian chisel shaped into the block,
Teaching its stillness to contain a soul—
A face e'en thus in boyhood, pale, yet bright
With the first sunbeam of unwoken power—
Beneath its clustering rings of dark brown hair
An eye of deepest beauty, and a lip
Haughty and curved—e'en such as might have been Apollo's, when disguised among the hills
He wore the shepherd's garb unrecognized.
How we went happy, singing in the sun,
Seeing no coming cloud in all our sky,
And dreaming of the brother tall and young,
Pacing his college halls with some old book,
While o'er the music of immortal words
The unquiet lip went murmuring, like the sea,
Bippling along the golden shore at eve.
We said—he forgeth armor for the strife,
In hostile thronged arenas of the world—
Like a young knight shall he come forth equipped
In all his shining arms, for his first field.
Alas! that morn of fight did never come.
Within the chapel where he watched the night,
The shining arms lie rusting on the ground;
How can the soul, immortal though it be,
Abide that untold hour that doth divide
Future and past, eternity and time;
When trembling on the shadowy verge, it sees
All it hath loved and known, receding far,
While up and round the whirling clouds divide,
And all the dread Eternal and Unknown,
Unfold to view?
But lo! One goes before thee on the way,
As thou dost pass the closing gates of life—
He takes thy hand — young spirit, fear thee not.
The beauteous one, with flowing garments on,
Garments of Bozra, dyed with crimson stain,
Cometh from Edom, his apparel red,
Like them that tread the wine-press, and his face
Radiant, yet pale, illumes thy darkened way.
Young brother, fare thee well! awhile we part—
And yet we part not. Still thy memory lives,
Serene and deep, a presence in our souls.
Even as forest fountain, curtained in,
Amid the dark green wilderness of leaves
Far o'er it, in the fluttering foliage high,
Their summer lays the wandering wild birds chant
In the light sunshine; and the careless winds
Sing through the rippling leaves, but reach it not.

ENUL.

As Ranney, 195 Broadway, has published Meyer & Minden's sectional Map of Minnersota. It is elegantly got out, and bound in duodecimo form, and will be found useful to persons travelling in that section of the country.

A prize of 10,000 francs has been offered by the Duke de Luynes, a known art-patron, to the person who shall discover the most important new process for the improvement of potography, especially for a means of fixing sun-pictures and making them durable. Artists of all nations are invited to compete, and the award will be made by the committee of the Photographic Society of France, of which M. Luynes is a member.

A very crowded meeting was held in the court-house at Stirling, on Wednesday week, for the purpose of concerting measures for the collection of subscriptions to the Wallace Monument Fund in the burgh and county of Stirlingshire.

Signor Rossini has returned to Paris for the winter, with health entirely restored.

TALKING STATUES.

[No. I.]

A NIGHT IN THE CORK EXHIBITION.

The reader who has visited the Exhibition will, it is hoped, understand the allusions in the following paper. For the information of others, it may be necessary to mention that the objects of art introduced, are the "Eve," and "Psyche" of M'Dowell; Foley's "Youth at a Stream;" Heffernan's "Susannah;" Hogan's "Drunken Faun;" Lawler's "Venus;" "The Lost One" (described as the youth bearing the drowned boy), by Thomas Farrell, of Dublin; and the "Hunter Reposing," and "Bard," by his brothers Joseph and James Farrell; the "Sleeping Child," by Christopher Mooney; the bust of Miss Catherine Hayes, by E. A. Foley; and the figure of Erin. This last, however, as described, is purely ideal, but legitimately brought in, as Hogan's figure of "Hibernia" occupied a position in the Fine Arts' Court, and suggested it. It may be as well to add that Erin is described as wearing a blue mantle—as blue, not green, is the heraldic color pertaining to Ireland now.—Dublin University Magazine.

'Tis nothing to the reader why I happened to be there at such an unusual time, and on that point I don't mean to give any explanation whatever—but I found myself in the centre of the Fine Arts Hall of the Irish National Exhibition, at Cork, at a pretty advanced period of the night of the 12th of September. I had been soundly asleep for a couple of hours previously, on one of Jones's sofas, during which interval my faculties had been partially absorbed in a confused dream, wherein the Earl of Eglinton, fishing in a Claddagh hooker, was attacked by the Danes, under Brian Boroihme, but retreating behind Telford's oran, discharged several volleys of Booth and Fox's prepared feathers, with such effect, from one of Captain Norton's rifles, at the old monarch, as to convert him into a fine specimen of the Aquila Kerriensis, which was immediately laid hold of by Dr. Harvey, and incontinently thrust into his ornithological case, at which precise moment St. Patrick awoke me, by ringing his bell in the most violent fashion, quite close to my ear.

I started suddenly to my feet—all was still and silent.

The moonlight shone quietly down through the glazed canopy above me, and poured its serene radiance through the noiseless building. The effect was beautiful in the extreme. The pure white statuary seemed spiritualised by the magic of the hour, and my eye wandered in breathless admiration, from one glorious creation to another, till it rested, spell-bound, on the lovely, the divine Psyche of M'Dowell, thought I, as I gazed on that pensive countenance, with its ineffable gentleness and quiet beauty, "and how that sadness does touch the heart. Surely, Mythology has nothing to compare with that fable of the Soul, raised by Love to immortality, and trembling in doubt, if she were indeed made a participator in the deathless existence of the celestials. And how wondrously has the sculptor here given shape and reality to the poet's thought!"

> "Her's is the only face in heaven
> That wears a sadness in its joy,"

The first stroke of midnight sounded as I spoke, but my gaze remained rivetted on the face of Psyche. One after another came the twelve notes that told the "witching hour," each seeming fainter and more indistinct than the preceding, till the last sounded like a far-off echo. Meanwhile, though my eyes moved not for an instant from the lovely object before them, I felt conscious of a change in the atmosphere of the hall, though what change I could not guess. It seemed as if the moon-light had gradually given place to a warmer and less silvery radiance, and this altered light, too, appeared more immediately diffused around the form on which I stood gazing. A deliberate tinge of the faintest rose-color began to overspread the pure whiteness of the statue. Strange, surely, but stranger still, the hue, at first uniform and hardly to be perceived, grew brighter on the softly pensive face before me, and deepened into a rich carnation on the parted lips. Was I dreaming, or did a sigh upheave the twin rose-buds that now contrasted with the veined transparency of that girlish bosom? I would have rubbed my eyes to test their wakefulness, but some power had paralysed my movements. I fixed my gaze more intensely on the statue. The hair, drawn back from the still snowy forehead, seemed as though it had been steeped in sunshine, and the blue depths of the downcast eyes were fathomless. Looking downward, I saw the delicate feet, fair as summer-lilies, just visible below the folds of the drapery that wrapped the lower limbs, and, at that instant, the white butterfly fluttered into the air, and alighted on its mistress's brow. The figure was no more inanimate, and Psyche, glowing and immortal, was before me.

"Oh, Bacchus!" exclaimed a loud and husky voice, a little on my right hand, manifestly struggling through a violent yawn, "what an infernally uncomfortable posture you left me in so long! My back will never be right again. Silenus pity me! Not a drain left in my flask either. By the crown of Ariadne, I'm the most miserable animal in the universe!"

The rigidity of my limbs had been suddenly removed, and I was no longer motionless. Astounded at what I saw and heard, I looked, tremblingly, in the direction of the voice, and there beheld Hogan's Faun, in a condition very unlike sobriety, lifting himself from the ground, and grumbling heartily all the while at his situation.

"Good gracious," cried I, "what can all this mean? That's no statue, surely. 'Tis a real live Faun, and no mistake. The fellow seems coming this way, too;" and I slunk behind the large lob-table.

"By the son of the Theban Semele," cried the Faun, staggering along the hall, with his empty flagon, "I never was so thirsty, 'in all my born days,' as that Irishman, Hogan—Pluto seize his unlucky soul—used to say, when he was educating me to whiskey-drinking. Cerberus bite the limbs off him! for taking advantage of me when I was in liquor, and making a show of of me as I did. The fellow pretending, too, that I was turned out of his workshop. By the vineyards of Falernus, if I had a hold of him, I'd break his head with his own mallet. But, what's to be done for a drink? Oh! if I had some of that same Irish stuff of Hogan's, wouldn't I be a lucky dog? What's that stave he used to sing about it?

> "Whiskey, drink divine,
> Why should drivellers bore us,
> With the praise of wine,
> While we've thee before us!"

Whoop—hurroo!—that's the stuff to get drunk upon. Hogan, I say, Hogan, you rascal, I'll forgive you for your shabby trick, if you bring me a bottle of the native. By the great Dionysius, I'm as dry as a lime-kiln. But, sure, there must be some of the article here. Isn't this the Irish National Exhibition? Ino despise me, if I don't make a search for it. Hurroo—whoop! Here goes for a foray." And he staggered by me, towards the northern hall, hallooing and singing, in the most uproarious manner.

I glanced towards Psyche, as the turbulent individual went by, but she seemed wholly unruffled by his proceedings. Her face wore the same sweetly pensive look, the same divine serenity as ever, and she sat calm and motionless as marble.

A voice, soft as the south wind, and full of divinest music, whispered almost at my ear, "Why so pensive always, Psyche? Will you never trust the amaranthine wreath which Jupiter has awarded you? Will you ever doubt the eternity of your existence?"

The girlish brow was raised—the dove-like eyes turned on the questioner with an expression of earnestness, such as I had never yet beheld—an expression which is fixed indelibly in my memory, and with tones that thrilled through my entire frame like magic, the young Psyche answered—"Oh! sweet Venus, can I believe that Love is mine immortally?" Tears started into her sapphire eyes, as the words were spoken, and she bowed her lovely head again.

"Immortally!" said Venus. "Why doubt what has been so solemnly engaged for you? Is not Love immortal, and are not you?"

The butterfly fluttered from the brow of Psyche to her bosom and nestled over her heart. Her smile lost its sadness, and a reliance stole across her face, which words cannot tell the like of, for there is nothing like it.

The Faun was distinctly visible, in the eastern hall, where he was evidently proceeding in the most riotous manner

"It is the tree of knowledge," said a bland, insinuating tongue behind me. "Thou fairest of created beings, the fruit, if thou wilt but taste of it, will make thee as superior to the angels in power, as thou art in beauty. Why should'st thou pause?"

I turned abruptly round. There, in all her dazzling loveliness, stood the mother of the human race, gazing on the archtempter, and drinking in the first words of flattery that fell on the charmed ear of woman. Was it, indeed, flattery that told her that her beauty surpassed that of the angels? There, fresh from the hands of her Maker, his "last, most perfect work"—unsullied by a single sin, untouched by a single sorrow—in the full happiness of her new existence—had creation aught, in its whole domain, to rival her? Did not God's own angels pause in their flight over the terrestrial paradise, to gaze on the wondrous charms of her who had been given as a companion to the new-made Adam?

There was a slight rustling, as of a serpent moving through the grass. For a moment my senses became confused. I saw nothing, but a voice sounded in the air, saying—"She has fallen. The fruit of the tree of knowledge has been tasted, and death and sin will be the heritage of man. Want, and sorrow, and crime, and suffering, shall, through successive ages, overshadow the earth, which is to be the dwelling place of her children. But, through want, and sorrow, and crime, and suffering, the beauty of their erring mother shall never pass from amongst her daughters. Fairest object of God's fair creation, long as the ill of which she was the parent shall affect her race, so long will her loveliness, too, remain—not as man first beheld it, bright as the sunlight of a cloudless noon, but taking a thousand different aspects amid his various destinies, and, alas! her own. As the radiance of the morning rainbow — as the lustre of the evening star—as the moonbeam on the placid waters — as the meteor in the stormy sky—amid doubt and danger, guilt and death — that which was to have been the crowning happiness of his home will be the unfading solace of his exile. She has fallen; but woman shall for ever be to man as she was to him first created, when, in the ecstasy of his delight, he called her Cavah!"

The words ceased. I raised my eyes to look again at the figure of Eve, but she had disappeared.

The voice which had before spoken, said on the instant — "You have seen the mother of the human race. Look around on the first sorrow which she brought into the world — death."

I obeyed. A youth, beautiful in proportions, firm and elastic in tread, moved past me, bearing on his shoulders the lifeless form of a younger boy, whose dripping hair, as it fell backwards from the pure and finely developed forehead, told how it was that his brief span of life had ended.

"Bear him gently to his mother," said the spirit-voice, in softened tones, inaudible save to myself; "she pays a bitter penalty for her mother's sin. Born amid such agonizing doubts and fears—nursed with such sleepless yearning love—watched over in sickness with such pain and suffering, and reared to such golden promise — is this the end of all? Woman, woman, let not man upbraid you; for on you, frail being that you are, falls the full retribution of the primal error!"

The tears started to my eyes as I listened. The figure slowly passed. As I looked after the youth, the radiant face of Psyche once again attracted my attention; her lovely lips were moving at the moment, and, as if in a trance of bliss, she uttered softly, "I am, then, indeed, immortal, and love is mine immortally."

And I felt that there was a deep meaning in the words, and that death was but a passing shadow on the stream of eternity.

The sound of voices at the northern extremity of the hall aroused me from my reverie; and, loooking in that direction, I thought I beheld two beautiful forms on the steps of the vestibule. I stole gently towards them, and, to my surprise, discovered that they were those of Eve and Venus — the latter gazing with evident amazement at her companion, while some trace of envy seemed to mingle with the admiration displayed in her looks.

"You are not a goddess," said Venus; "yet you are surely too lovely for aught else. You have not that harsh expression which made the imperious Juno so objectionable, and you do not exhibit that air of fancied superiority which Minerva puts on, because of her boasted learning; you certainly are handsomer than either of them. Who are you, beautiful being?"

"I am a woman," said Eve, with a look of deep ingenuousness. "Are you not one also?"

"No," answered Venus, "I am a goddess."

"And what is a goddess?" asked Eve. "I see no difference between us, but that you are so very beautiful."

"A goddess," replied Venus, laughing archly, "is a myth. I am the poet's dream of beauty."

"You have a strange language; I do not comprehend it. What is the poet."

"And you can ask! Woman not know her worshipper? It cannot be!"

"Indeed," replied Eve, "I never knew a poet."

"Listen to me," said Venus; "I am not mortal, yet am I, whatever else may be said of me in fables, skilfully contrived, of mortal birth. I am your child, fair Eve, but an impalpable and unembodied one, born in the hour when Adam first beheld you. In that instant he became, what you were now puzzled to hear named—a poet; gazing on you, his fancy warmed, and felt the power to vivify. Ideal beauty, then was born — beauty like yours, and yet unlike; at once like yours, and like to that of all your loveliest daughters: various as all, and beautiful as each—now fair as morning, now as evening dusk; with tresses golden as the sunlight now, anon as black as the raven's plume; changeful in shape and stature; but to each most perfect, as I bear some strong resemblance to the form or face of some beloved woman—such am I."

"I knew not that I had such a lovely and mysterious child; where is it that you dwell?"

"I could not answer that question," said Venus; "for, in fact, I am ubiquitous. My votaries find me everywhere. Hidden deep in the rudest block of shapeless marble, the poet sculptor has discovered me, and has not been content until he has revealed me to the world."

"How very singular! But what is the cause of your being here?"

"Why are any of us here?" answered Venus, more Hibernico. "The National Exhibition, of course, has brought us all. By the way, what an interest your daughters seem to take in it."

"Wonderful," said Eve; "and, indeed, when I met you now, I was just coming to look at what attracted so much of their attention in this northern hall. You know I was obliged, like yourself, to remain continually in the Fine Arts' Court, till this moment, and I could not come to look at the laces, and the crochet, and soforth, that I heard them perpetually talking about."

"What do they want of all these things? I don't understand why it is they don't remain in their original condition the same as you and I do."

"Oh," said Eve, with a sigh and a blush, "the fault is mine. I brought clothes on them, with all their other misfortunes, by trusting to that nasty, slippery serpent: but, indeed, I see no necessity for the way they spoil their appearance, in the use of them. I wore very little myself, but I would not appear as I do, only that M'Dowell left me no choice. He took my petticoat away."

This was said with such naiveté that it was with difficulty I refrained from laughing loudly.

"I should greatly like to know," said Eve, continuing, after a moment — "if my daughters, whom I saw at the Exhibition, are like their mother in shape. It is quite impossible to tell, with all those clothes. I have seen lovely faces amongst them, many exquisitely beautiful hands, and now and then got a glimpse at a charming neck and throat, but beyond that it is all clothes — clothes—clothes — clothes. Is it not very provoking?"

"You noticed Susannah, of course," said Venus, in reply. "She, at least, bears a pretty strong resemblance to you in every way. She is very lovely."

"Yes, but Susannah never adopted these modern fashions. Her Jewish dress is quite different from what those girls wear."

"The men are just as great a riddle," said Venus; "queer-looking things, with round boxes on their heads, and a great wall of silks and linen round their necks and faces, instead of beards and whiskers."

I felt that the conversation was presumed to be private, and that I really had no right to remain a listener; but my curiosity got the better of my propriety, and I did.

CONCLUSION NEXT WEEK.

MR. MEAGHER'S LECTURE BEFORE THE COLUMBIAN ASSOCIATION, BOSTON.

From the Boston Post.

Mr. Meagher's lecture at Trenton Temple last Wednesday evening, drew one of the largest and most enthusiastic audiences that we have ever seen in that fine hall. At eight o'clock, Mr. N. J. Bean, the Secretary of the Association, arose and explained to the audience, in a brief and lucid address, the objects of the Columbian Association, its antecedents and origin. Its objects, under the present organization, were of a literary character; it had merged from the Columbian Artillery into its present form, after the disbanding of that corps by Gov. Gardner; and still it lived and would continue to live, in defiance of high-handed injustice. The Columbian Artillery was formed on the 17th of October, 1798, and had been in existence for a period of about fifty-six years. Mr. Bean then closed by introducing the lecturer, who was received with the most enthusiastic acclamations.

Mr. Meagher prefaced his lecture with an able description of the characteristics, the vicissitudes, and the traditions and poetical superstitions of the Irish nation and people. He had paid a high tribute to the great literary merits and simplicity and purity of the subject of his lecture, Gerald Griffin; described the trials and sufferings he had passed through in the modern Babylon, in his struggles for literary distinction. The eloquent lecturer also read copious extracts from Gerald Griffin's works, the poetical portions of which were refreshingly natural, and abounding in sympathy and pathos. A humorous description of an Irish village school from "The Collegians" produced among the audience the most boisterous outbursts of merriment. Mr. Meagher closed his lecture by describing the piety and Christian benevolence of Gerald Griffin.

After the lecture Mr. Meagher made a long and powerful address to the Columbian Association, in which he promised to ever identify himself with them in resistance to all arbitrary insults to the people of the country to which he belonged, or of their descendants.

Military News.

"THE IRISH NEWS GUARDS."

This company, under the command of Captain Edward K. Butler, and numbering sixty-two muskets, had their first target excursion to the Red House on the 13th inst. They mustered at the Eagle Drill Rooms, marched down the Bowery, through Chatham and Chambers-streets into Broadway, and thence to Ann-street, where they saluted the "Irish News" office. They were neatly uniformed, marched well, and presented a dashing, soldier-like appearance. Shelton's band gave out the grand old spirit-stirring airs of "the Harp that once through Tara's Hall," "Garry Owen," "White Cockade," "Patrick's Day," "Hail Columbia," &c. As they proceeded up Broadway, "drums beating and colors flying," and bayonets flashing, the uninitiated were puzzled to know what the tricolor of green, white and orange, that waved beside the stars, symbolised. Some said it was a French Red-Republican flag; others that it was the filibustering flag of General Wm. Walker, whereas it simply represented the Irish confederate banner of '48, typifying the liberty, equality and fraternity of Catholic, Protestant and Presbyterian, who had joined hands and struck a league against the common enemy of their country. The sight of that little strip of green, evoked old memories, awakened slumbering recollections, and stirred the heart with glowing emotions. It was the color under which Sarsfield fought, bled and conquered. It was the color unfurled by Owen Roe on the plains of Benburb—under which O'Donnell and O'Neil marshalled their clans to victory—it met the foe in Limerick breach, and never yet went down unavenged in close of battle. Yes, it stirred old memories, brought us back to home scenes, and we were proud to see it borne by the "Irish News Guard," on republican soil.

The Guard had a bright and pleasant day at the Red House. Their shooting was excellent. The shattered and closely riddled target bespoke marksmen of the keenest class—sharp-shooters of no ordinary calibre. The dinner was superb, and was done ample justice to by the entire company. Captain Butler presided, and, after the viands were thoroughly discussed, proposed the first toast—"Thomas Francis Meagher," which was received with loud cheers. Mr. R. J. Lalor responded in a brief and appropriate speech, and in conclusion, gave the health of Mrs. Meagher, as good as she is beautiful, and many happy returns to her of the anniversary—of which we are on the eve—when she became the wife of Thomas Francis Meagher. The announcement of the toast was received with three enthusiastic cheers and one cheer more. Mr. Roche being called upon, responded in suitable terms. His observations were repeatedly interrupted by loud applause.

The next toast was, "The health of John Mitchel," which was received with the most enthusiastic cheering. Mr. Haverty responded.

The Chairman then gave, "Our Adopted Land"—received with rapturous applause. This toast was responded to in an able and eloquent speech, by Mr. Eugene O'Sullivan.

The next toast was, "Our Guests," which was spoken to by Mr. E. J. Talbot, who proposed "The Irish News Guard." Capt. Butler responded, and then gave "The Irish News, and Mr. Roche." Mr. Roche returned thanks.

The Chairman then gave, as a concluding toast, "Lieutenant Nagle of the Nicaraguan army, and success to the cause he fights for." This toast and sentiment were received with three cheers and a tiger.

The judges then proceeded to measure the target, preparatory to the awarding of the prizes—forty in number. During the interval the company amused themselves in a general war dance. After the distribution of the several prizes, the company returned to the city at nine o'clock in the evening, after having spent a most delightful day. They marched from Fourteenth Street down Fourth Avenue to Astor Place, then down Broadway, through Grand to the Eagle Drill Rooms, where they dismissed, having previously arranged for attending Mr. Meagher's lecture on Monday night, for the benefit of the late Captain Kerrigan's widow and child.

The Guard are required to meet on Friday evening, the 21st instant, at the "Eagle Drill Rooms," by eight o'clock.

The Waterford Republican Musketeers, Captain Slater, went out on their first Target Excursion, to the "Red House," Harlem, on Monday last. En route they favored us with a salute. They numbered 35 muskets. They were tastefully accoutred, well officered, and presented an excellent appearance—as, with the stars and stripes and Irish Tricolor proudly waving, they marched, counter-marched, and presented arms, to honor us.

The Seventy-fifth Regiment in the Crystal Palace.—The Seventy-fifth Regiment, under command of Colonel McCann, visited the Ladies' Fair at the Crystal Palace, on Thursday evening, accompanied by Bohn's military band. The gay uniform of the officers, the fine soldier-like bearing of the men, and the stirring music of the band, added considerably to the attractions of the evening, while the funds of the Fair were much increased by the liberality of the gallant 75th.

American News.

The U. S. Steamer George Law, from Aspinwall on the 3d, arrived here on the 18th with 674 passengers and upwards of a million and a half dollars in freight. The Alta California of October 20th, furnishes the following summary of the fort night's news:

In this city the Republicans and the People's party have united upon a local ticket, thereby rendering the election of the reform candidates for our municipal offices well nigh certain. There is also but little doubt the Legislative delegation from from this district will consist of men pledged to vote for an amnesty act, and to carry out generally the views of the party favorable to the Committee.

Great attention is being paid to political affairs throughout the State, and how California will cast her vote on the Presidential question is a matter of entire doubt. The reception of the Maine news has no doubt acted favorably on the Republican cause, and inspired its supporters with additional hope of success. Still this does not appear to have impaired the confidence of either of the other parties in their ability to carry the State.

Miss Mary Provost, lately from the New-York Theatre, made her first appearance before a San Francisco audience on the evening of the 13th, at the American. She was well received, and became quite a favorite. The same evening, Madame Lola Montes commenced an engagement at the Metropolitan.

A smart shower fell in this city on the evening of October 7, being the first rain of the season. It extended throughout the interior and continued during a great portion of the night in the mining districts, raising the rivers and causing much inconvenience to miners upon some of the streams.

An Indian recently killed another of his race in Los Angelos from no higher motive than to possess himself of $2 and a new pair of shoes, which he knew the other had about his person. Murders among these people are frequent in that section, and are often perpetrated with even less inducement than the above.

The juvenile portion of our community have been seized with the newspaper mania. Since the 1st, two boy papers, one the "Eagle of Freedom," and the other the "Young America," have appeared. Although small, they do the young idea considerable credit.

A notorious highwayman, known as Tom Bell, has been taken and executed in Tulare county. Several reputed to be of his gang have been arrested.

Robberies and murder have been less frequent in the mountains for the last week or two, since more stringent measures have been adopted for their suppression.

The proclamation of Governor Johnson, declaring this city in a state of insurrection, has not yet been withdrawn.

John S. Robb, well known from his connection with the press both here and in the East, died at Sacramento on the 5th of October.

Mr. A. Clute, of Albany, N. Y. was drowned at Belina Bay, a few weeks ago, from the capsizing of a boat in which he was attempting to land.

The Pioneer Guards, formerly a portion of the Vigilance Committee force, had a target festival on the 10th. The shooting was the best ever seen in the State.

The Democratic election for delegates to nominate County and Legislative officers, was held on the 11th inst., and resulted in the triumph of the Broderick faction.

A fine specimen of California grown cotton was exhibited at the fair.

Los Angelos.—The grape crop in this section has been abundant the present year beyond all precedent.

Central America.—From Costa Rica the intelligence is to the 6th ult. The Star and Herald says:—

General Canas was still on the frontier, watching the Walker party, and a large additional force is to be sent to join him immediately. Private advices state that 1,000 men had already marched, and 500 to 1,800 more were soon to follow. A public meeting was held on the 5th of October at San Jose, in which it was uaanimously agreed to carry on the war with vigor. The Bishop of San Jose made an offer to government of all his private property, and many influential citizens contributed largely to the expenses of the war.

From Nicaragua, the news is no later than that previously received direct.

From New Granada we have Isthmus papers to the 1st instant.

The Panama Star and Herald, of the day named, furnishes the following respecting the suspension of relations between Great Britain and New Granada:—

By a sailing vessel, which arrived at Aspinwall on Thursday, from Carthagena, we have received the important information that Mr. Griffith, H.B.M.'s Charge d'Affairs at Bogota, having failed to arrange with the New Granadian Government the old standing Mackintosh's claim, has broken off negotiations with the Government, and given notice that the Admiral of the British West India Squadron has been ordered to enforce the payment of the claim.

Oregon.—The Indian troubles in this Territory have recently been renewed, and threaten to become more serious and extensive than ever before. Governor Stephens, who had advanced into the Walla Walla country, for the purpose of negotiating a general peace with all the tribes in that quarter, had been obliged to evacuate the same, together with such U. S. troops as had accompanied him.

Miscellaneous American News.

Lieutenant Berryman, who was sent out by the Navy Department, in the ship Arctic, to ascertain the depth, by soundings, from Newfoundland to Ireland, with reference to the practicability of a submarine telegraph, has submitted his report, together with the maps and charts, to the Navy Department, which will be published in the reports accompanying the Secretary's Annual Report. It is very brief and to the point. He starts out by making soundings every thirty or forty miles, varying from one hundred fathoms to two thousand and seventy-five fathoms; no place beyond the latter figure, that being the deepest point. In almost every sounding he brought up various kinds of curiosities, such as shells of every description, gravel, quantities of mud, &c., all of which have been deposited in the Smithsonian Institute. On his return he made the same experiments of soundings with the same success. No where did he find any obstructions or impediments in the way, and establishes clearly and conclusively, and beyond a shadow of doubt, in his judgment, the practicability and feasibility of the submarine telegraph between those two points. He says, that the whole thing can be accomplished in ten days after everything is in readiness. During the month of July, in his judgment, is the time it should be done. He further says that the wires would sink down into soft muddy bottom, and that nothing could possibly interfere with them. This settles beyond doubt all question as to the practicability of connecting the two continents by a submaire telegraph.

Railway Celebration.—The celebration of the opening of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, from Quebec nearly to Lake Huron, came off at Montreal on the 12th instant. The principle feature was a splendid banquet, at which speeches were made by the Mayor of Montreal; the Governor-General of Canada; Senator Wilson of Massachusetts; Sir Wm. Eyre, commander of the British forces in Canada; Col. Tache of the Canadian Parliament; Gov. Kent of Maine; Judge Day; the Mayor of Toronto, and others. The city was thronged with strangers from all parts of Canada and the Northern States. During the day there was a great procession of the people, and a torchlight procession.

Another of those frightful accidents at sea involving the destruction of a steamer and a great loss of life has taken place. The steamer Lyonnaise left this port on the 1st inst., and was struck by a large ship on the morning of the 3rd inst., and was so injured that the next day the steamer was abandoned by her crew. Some 16 persons were saved by the boats, and 40 are believed to have perished.

Latest from Nicaragua.

The steamer Texas, brings Granada news to the 1st inst. Everything is quiet since the battle. Gen. Walker was awaiting the arrival of the recruits from the United States before marching upon Massaya and Leon. In the meantime, General Henningsen, who succeeded General Goicouri, has been very active in drilling his brigade with the mountain howitzers and mortars, which arrived after the battles of October 12th and 13th, and instructing the men in the use of the Minnie rifle, many of whom have already attained great proficiency.

Walker's army now consists of about two thousand fighting men, including the reinforcements under Col. Jaques. They are in high spirits, and extremely anxious for another engagement with the enemy. The brutal and unprovoked murder of unarmed American citizens at Granada on the 12th ult., created the strongest feeling of indignation throughout the Nicaraguan army.

The Nicaraguense says:—

"It cannot be said that it happened by accident, or while the soldiers were in such a state of excitement as not to be aware of what they did; for as yet they had not been engaged in any action, nor had they a shot yet fired upon them by any of the citizens of Granada. The residence of Mr. Lawless is situated about midway between the large plaza and the Jalteba Church. His house was the first they came to inhabited by Americans, and without provocation or cause, while the American flag was flying over the door, and against his protests, they first robbed him of all that was valuable in his house, and then dragged him out from under the folds of that flag, which should have made his person sacred, and shot him with coolness and deliberation.

"As if to add to the atrocity, they were not content with taking his life. Being an American citizen, instead of protecting him while living, was the cause of a continuance of outrage upon his remains after death. Seven bayonets were trust through his body after he had been shot."

It was expected that Walker would fight a decisive battle about the 8th or 10th inst., unless the enemy retreated too rapidly before him.

The steamer La Vergin arrived at Granada on the 30th ult., from Rubaldo in Chontales, with a full freight of cotton, corn and rice. Every thing was quiet in that department. The accounts from the mines were very favorable. Another silver vein has been opened, and extensive copper mines had been discovered in the neighborhood of Boac.

A Topographical and Geological survey of the State is to be made. Prof. Jas. T. Hodge, of New-York, has been appointed State Surveyor and Geologist.

Among the passengers of the Texas are Don Fermin Ferrer, formerly Provisional President of the Republic of Nicaragua, and Secretary of Hacienda and Public Credit, and now Minister Plenipotentiary to the U.S.; Hon. J. H. Wheeler, U.S. Minister, who returns on account of his health; Col. J. H. Fabens, bearer of despatches; Col. B. F. Anderson, N. A., and Col. G. B. Hall, N. A.

The English fleet remains at San Juan Del Norte, as at the latest dates.

THE CLAN GIBBON.

From a Correspondent of the Cork Examiner.

Edmund Fitz-Gibbon, known as the White Knight of the Valley, who flourished here, seated at Galtee Castle, in the 15th century, could command and possessed—

"Warlike clans,
Romantic glens,
Stupendous peaks,
And crystal lakes.
Woodstock bowers
And lofty towers,
Fertile fields,
Exuberant yields."

The great antiquity of the name of Gibbon exceeds and surpasses all the other names that I find on record in Ireland. In the year of the world 1048, we find the family of Saul punished by God, for his perfidy to the Gibeonites; and, in the days of Solomon, we find the Gibeonites building the Temple. The branch of this magnanimous family who settled in Rome, assumed the name of Gibbeline, and their potent valor was such in the 12th century, that they expelled the Guelphs and placed General Hapsburgh on the throne of Austria. The Milesians, who arrived in Ireland, from Spain, in the year of the world 1372, brought a branch of the Gibbelines; and we find their noble descendant seated at the beautiful Ballygiblin, near Mallow, who flew from the fury of the ruthless Cromwell, after the battle of Discarroll, in 1647, and took refuge in Connaught, and built a castle near the romantic Cong, in Mayo, known in our own time as Castle Gibbon. We find the Clan Gibbons of South Munster allied by marriage to the Geraldines, who flourished in this province from the 12th to the 15th century.

Edmund Fitz-Gibbon, the Knight of the Valley, whose illustrious ancestor gave name to the luxuriant principality of Clan-Gibbon, which reached from the copious banks of the river Blackwater to the lofty summit of the picturesque and verdant Galtees, left no male issue by his lady, the daughter of Sir John Fitz-Gerald, of Ashskeaton Castle, so celebrated from the magnificent ruins of its once great abbey, but left four daughters; the eldest of them married her kinsman, the unfortunate and last Earl of Desmond, who head was sent as a present to Queen Elizabeth, by Sir Walter Raleigh. The second daughter married Charles MacCarthy, of Macroom Castle, better known as Earl of Mountcashel. The third daughter married Sir Toby Butler, uncle to James Duke of Ormond, at the time seated at Kilcash, near Clonmel. The fourth married Sir William Fenton, by whom she had no male issue. The eldest daugher of the Attorney General Fenton married her kinsman, Colonel Fitz-Gerald, the son of Sir James of Strankally, near Youghal, who killed Sir John Norris, of Mallow, at the battle of Moycollop, near Lismore, in 1619.

On the marriage of the rich heiress of Galtee Castle with Sir Robert King, of Boyle, in the county of Roscommon, the chief of the barony of Clan Gibbon became possessed by the Lords of Kingston, in addition to the Rockingham Manors, wrenched from the plundered and persecuted MacDermotts, Princes of Coolavin.

The magnificent ruins of Galtee Castle, for centuries the residence of the Clan-Gibbon family, is romantically situated in a beautiful glen, watered by the serpentine river Funchen, which separates the counties of Cork, Tipperary, and Limerick. Nature enriched this charming locality with picturesque scenery and fertile fields, flowing with milk and honey. The collateral branches of this ancient house are the earls of Clare—now seated at Mountshannon—the Fitzgibbons, of Castlemahon, from whom William Fitzgibbon, Esq., the much esteemed mayor of that Southern emporium Cork City, boasts his unsullied lineage, who has distinguished himself as a good citizen, an eminent merchant, and an upright, conscientious magistrate.

The arms of the Fitzgibbons is the Wild Boar that could never be conquered; their motto—"This hand is hostile to tyrants." But the Earl of Clare has assumed the motto, "Nil Admirari"—to be astonished at nothing. The Clan Gibbons, interspersed through the counties of Limerick, Mayo, Clare, and Cork, are descended from the same illustrious and magnanimous ancestor; but the usurpation of Cromwell, in 1649, and that of the Prince of Orange, in 1690, expelled the several branches from their ancient inheritance.

Daguerreotypes.

Mark the Facts!—J. GURNEY'S establishment, No. 349 Broadway, corner of Leonard street, is the oldest and most extensive in the United States. GURNEY was the first to introduce the Art of Photography in this city. GURNEY has recently made important alterations and improvements in his establishment. GURNEY has now greater facilities for producing finer work in every branch than has heretofore been produced in this country. GURNEY has still in his employ the best of his old artists. GURNEY has recently added to the above a talented corps of American, French, and German artists. GURNEY'S colored Photographs of all sizes need only to be seen to be appreciated; they speak for themselves. GURNEY'S plain, unretouched Photographs were never equaled—so say artists and the best judges. GURNEY'S Daguerreotypes are universally pronounced superior productions. GURNEY has received more testimonials for his skill than any other artist in the profession. GURNEY received the only medal for Photographic productions at the late Paris Exposition—consequently, GURNEY stands at the head of the world in the Photographic Art. GURNEY has not removed any branch of his business to any part of the city. GURNEY has no connection with any other establishment in any part of the city. GURNEY attends personally to his patrons and friends, and has done so for the last sixteen years. GURNEY will be most happy to continue that attention, and will still endeavor to please all who may favor him with a visit to his Photographic Palace of Art. J. GURNEY,

FACTS
THAT NEED NO MARKING.
Progression.

From Humphrey's Photographic Journal of Sept. 1856.

We do not approve of the plan of puffing the members of the Photographic profession by way of personals. This may do very well when one is trying to bring his works into favor with such as are susceptible to flattery, and measure out their support according to the amount of editorial ink used as bait. We feel confident that those who best know will agree with us as that it is no puffing, when we can say with so much truth, that the Photographic Art this day owes, in no small degree, its position in this country to Mr. C. D. FREDRICKS, a gentleman who was the first to introduce the Photographic process upon an extensive scale in America. Previous to his establishing himself here, he visited Europe, and, with an enterprise worthy of imitation, he was not satisfied with first securing what knowledge he could himself gain, but also engaged the services of several of the most eminent Parisian Artists. He then, in connection with Mr. GURNEY, opened an establishment on a plan unequaled in the world.

After succeesfully following his profession, in connection with Mr. G., for some time, he has opened a "Temple of Art" in this City, under his own professorship and supervision. We have honestly and candidly presented the foregoing, feeling that is justly due to a fellow-laborer.

CHARLES D. FREDRICKS, late GURNEY & FREDRICKS, Photographs, Daguerreotypes, Ambrotypes, &c., No. 585 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel.

FACTS WHICH ARE KNOWN.—PHOTOGRAPHS, DAGUERREOTYPES, AMBROTYPES, &c.—The undersigned having removed the Photograph department and his Parisian artists from his old place of business, No. 349 Broadway, to his new and magnificent establishment, No. 585 Broadway, would call the attention of public to the fact that his Galleries, and the pictures made in them, are superior to anything before exhibited. Those desiring Photograps, Daguerreotypes, or Ambrotypes, executed by artists of refined taste, would do well to call and judge for themselves. Reception Rooms on the first floor, and are open from 8 A. M., to 10 P. M. CHARLES D. FREDRICKS,

Official Notices.

Mayor's Office, New-York, Nov. 13, 1856.—Acknowledging our dependence on Almighty God, and duly sensible that to his mercy we are indebted for continued peace, prosperity, and public health, while other communities, less favored, have been sorely afflicted with pestilence and devastation, we are now called upon to return thanks to the Author of our being, the Protector of our lives, and the Dispenser of all the blessings we enjoy.

With these sentiments, and in pursuance of custom and the Proclamation of his Excellency, Myron H. Clark, Governor of the State of New-York, that Thursday, the 20th day of November, inst., be set aside as a day of Praise, Thanksgiving and Prayer, I recommend the people of this city to observe that day as such, with all due respect and solemnity.

Given under my hand and seal of the Mayoralty, the day and year aforesaid. 2t FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

Proclamation! — Mayor's Office, Nov. 10, 1856.—Whereas, on the evening of the 18th of October last, Terrence Frawley, a resident of the City of New-York, while passing through Mott street, opposite or ner number 65 in that street, was stabbed and has since died from the wounds then and there received; and whereas there is good cause to believe that the said Frawley was so stabbed by a man named Dominick O'Donnell, Now, therefore, I, Fernando Wood, Mayor of the City of New-York, by virtue of the authority vested in me, do offer a reward of two hundred and fifty Dollars, for the arrest of the said O'Donnell. Said reward to be paid on his delivery to the keeper of any of the prisons of this city.

Custom House, New-York, Collector's Office, November 1, 1856.—Notice to Importers.—Importers are notified that all goods left in the Appraiser's store, No. 12 Broad street, after being examined by the Appraisers, whether the same have been originally entered for warehouse or not, will be treated as unclaimed goods and sold. The Appraisers' stores are not warehouses, under the warehouse act for the storage of merchandize in bond, and no property can be permitted to remain there after the legal examination has been made. It is the duty of importers to have their goods transferred to some private bonded warehouse, immediately after this examination, or withdraw them if the duty has been paid, and should this be neglected they must incur the risk of having their property transferred to the United States Stores at the Atlantic Dock, and sold as unclaimed.

AGENCY OF NICARAGUA, NO. 347 BROADWAY.—The undersigned having been appointed by the Government of Nicaragua GENERAL EMIGRANT AGENT in the United States, has established a permanent Agency at 347 Broadway, Room No. 2, up stairs. All persons desirous of obtaining information of any kind concerning Nicaragua, will receive prompt attention by addressing the undersigned, personally or by letter, at the office of the Agent.

The price of passage to Emigrants has been fixed at a very low figure; and for those without means, arrangements have been made with the Nicaragua Emigration Company to advance the price of passage, upon the transfer of a part of the land granted to each emigrant by the government of Nicaragua. This secures to Emigrants a large grant of land and a free passage to Nicaragua.

The new and splendid Steam-ship Texas, 1800 tons, will sail from the pier at the foot of Beach-street, North River for SAN JUAN DE NICARAGUA, on Saturday, Nov. 22, at 3 o'clock, P. M., to connect with the steamer Orizaba, from San Juan Del Sur.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparent expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

ELIZABETHAN ALE.

MEDICAL men now very generally recommend the occasional use of pure ale to those who are in need of nourishment; and it is undoubtedly the most wholesome beverage for general use that can be found. This is uot a new idea. In Queen Elizabeth's time our ancestors universally consumed it—from Elizabeth herself, in her palace, to the farmer in the field. In those days, adulterated wines and fiery liquors may be said to have been unknown, and very heavy penalties were enacted against using anything except malt and hops in brewing. It is not at all extravagant to assert, that the average duration of the life of a large portion of our race is a third less than it was, two or three huudred years ago, and this is chiefly attributable to what we eat and what we drink. Even now the heartiest people that can be found are from the rural districts of England, who yet follow the old fashioned diet.

All who use ale, whether as a beverage or for the purpose of nourishment, will find the Elizabethan Ale most excellent. Being made on the Scotch plan, it is as pure and wholesome, (if not equal in flavor) as the imported, while its cost is but little more than a common article. Families and retailers supplied at 120 WATER STREET, one door above Wall. oc4m3

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., July 10, 1856.

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a Subscriber to Mr. O'Mahony's translation of "Foras Feasa ar Erinn."

That is a book long wanted, and which the Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Elliott had lived, it would have been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America, a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes as Mr. O'Mahony. I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

Faithfully yours, JOHN MITCHEL.

LITTELL, SON & CO., BOSTON.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

THIS work is made up of the elaborate and stately essays of the EDINBURGH, QUARTERLY, and other Reviews; and BLACKWOOD' noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen Political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History and Common Life, by the sagacious SPECTATOR, the sparkling EXAMINER, the judicious ATHENEUM, the busy and industrious LITERARY GAZETTE, the sensible and comprehensive BRITANNIA, the sober and respectable CHRISTIAN OBSERVER; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the UNITED SERVICE, and with the best articles of the DUBLIN UNIVERSITY, NEW MONTHLY, FRASER'S, TAIT'S, AINSWORTH'S, HOOD'S and SPORTING MAGAZINES, and of Chambers' admirable JOURNAL. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from PUNCH; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of THE TIMES. We shall increase our variety by importations from the Continent of Europe, and from the growth of the British Colonies.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday—price, (free of postage) six dollars a year. Remittances for any period will be promptly attended to.

Complete sets of the FIRST SERIES, in thirty-six volumes, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principle cities, free of expense of freight, are for sale for Seventy-two Dollars. The Second Series began in 1853.

Any volume may be had separately, at Two Dollars, bound, or a Dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents—and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

☞ A few advertisements of Books, Patents, or other matters of general interest, will be added, at reasonable rates.

Extracts of Letters from Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, and President Adams.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I have read the prospectus with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give healthy tone, not only to our literature but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character.

JOSEPH STORY.

NEW-YORK, May 7, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of the "Living Age;" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates (of which I have no reason to doubt), it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. JAMES KENT.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe, and in this country, this has appeared to me the most useful. It contains, indeed, the exposition only of the current literature of the English language; but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind, in the utmost expansion of the present age. J. Q. ADAMS.

THE PANORAMA OF LIFE AND LITERATURE.

Published Monthly at the Office of Littell's Living Age,

Boston.

Every number of this work contains articles of leading interest; grave and earnest, yet not heavy; popular, and yet of abiding value. To these are added, in profuse abundance and great variety, Tales, Poetry, Voyages, Travels, and whatever—within the bounds of sound taste and good principles—may be included under the large head of Light Reading. But mere light reading soon becomes wearisome, unless there breathe from it spirit and heart, life and soul.

We promise a Magazine that shall be more and better than mere amusement: a Book suited to the leisure of the old and wise, and yet abundantly attractive to the young and ardent. It will freely provide for the Imagination, as well as for the Reason and Memory.

For THREE DOLLARS A YEAR, received at the office of publication, the Panorama will be sent (free of postage), to any post-office in the United States.

Two COPIES, Five Dollars a year; FIVE COPIES, Ten Dollars a year, Clubs to pay their own postage, which is three cents a number, payable QUARTERLY IN ADVANCE.

The first number was issued in July, 1855. It makes two large volumes a year. We can supply orders for back numbers or volumes.

Both Works are Published by Littell, Son & Company, Boston.

Contemplate the Life of Mary!

EDWARD DUNIGAN & BROTHER,

151 Fulton street, New-York,

Are now publishing in semi-monthly parts at 25 cents each and under the express approbation of the

MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

Archbishop of New-York,

The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary,

OF HER MOST CHASTE SPOUSE

St. Joseph,

AND HOLY PARENTS

St. Joachim and St. Anne.

Illustrated by fine Steel Engravings, and printed on superfine paper, with Chapter Headings, Borders, and Initial Letters, designed and engraved expressly for this work.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, is by the Rt. Rev. Romuald Gentilucci, Chamberlain to Pope Pius IX., is dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness, and approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace.

Gentilucci's work will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of ecclesiastical history that can, in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of Our Lord, as handed down in the loving tradition of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

The Life of Saint Joseph—no unfit companion for the elegant work of Gentilucci—is from the pen of Father Vallejo, a Mexican Jesuit of the last century, a work approved by the ecclesiastical authorities of the Roman States, and frequently reprinted.

CONDITIONS.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, Her Holy Spouse and Parents, will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a Steel Engraving and several Wood Cuts in each number, and will, when complete, form a volume of nearly 1000 pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

The work having received the approbation of His Holiness, himself, as well as of the illustrious Archbishop Hughes, it only remains for us to say, that it appears to be gracefully translated into our language, and the style in which it is produced, is really superior, both as to its genera appearance, as well as to the chasteness of the design, and execution of the illuminated borders which adorn every page of the work.—London Register and Catholic Standard.

No other work of our day on the same subject can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of the learned and devoted son of the Blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are no more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in this book. The translator has performed his task admirably.—Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work, itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truth Teller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the magnificent edition of the Bible of the enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

The work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but it seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

This work, translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, we like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

INDUCEMENT.

Each subscriber to this splendid work will receive with the last number a magnificent Steel Engraving suitable for framing, of the IMPORTANT TO TEACHERS and SUPERINTENDENTS of PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Your attention is directed to DR. JOHNSON'S PHILOSOPHICAL CHARTS FOR SCHOOLS and Academies. Being a series of ten. Each size 85 by 51 inches. Containing over 300 Drawings illustrative of almost every department of this branch of study, accompanied with an explanatory Key, forming the most valuable acquisition to school appurtenances ever produced in this country. Price neatly colored, and mounted on cloth and rollers, $15 per set.

OPINION OF THEODORE FRELINGHUYSEN, PRESIDENT OF RUTGERS COLLEGE, N. J.

"They furnish an admirable substitute for the far more expensive apparatus. These charts hung on the walls of a school-room, in all which I hope to see them, will spread before the scholar a palpable illustration of the great laws in Natural Philosophy. He will learn much of God from the works of His hand and the ordinance of His appointment.

"The small volume that comes with them, and a little explanation by the teacher, will render the CHARTS one of the most useful means of instruction."

N. B.—Sample copies of the Key, accompanied with a complete set of the Charts on a reduced scale, will be sent to any address, post-paid, on the receipt of 50 cents in cash or postage-stamps. Address

UNIVERSE,	Cave,	2,000
VANGUARD,	Norton,	1,800

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of their departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; or persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

REMITTANCES TO IRELAND.

IRISH EMIGRANT SOCIETY,
Office, 51 Chambers street.

NOTICE.—The recent failures, by which a large amount of Bills remitted from this country to friends in Ireland, has been returned unpaid, afford to this Society the opportunity, and at the same time impose upon it the duty of informing the public, that such losses would have been prevented if the parties purchasing Bills had availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Society.

For the purpose of entire protection a fund is constantly kept on deposit in the Bank of Ireland, against which this Society issues its drafts, payable at sight (from sums of £1 sterling and upwards), on the Bank and all its branches, and has thereby for the last Ten Years afforded a mode of remittance perfectly safe and unquestionable.

His offers to the trade, teachers and schools, are of the most favorable character, all of which he will be able to fill to the letter, for having wisely adopted the cash system. The Horace Waters' Pianos are known as among the very best. We are enabled to speak of those instruments with some degree of confidence, from personal knowledge of their excellent tone and durable quality.—N. Y. Evangelist. ap19tf

Daguerreotypes.

Mark the Facts!—J. GURNEY'S establishment, No. 349 Broadway, corner of Leonard street, is the oldest and most extensive in the United States. GURNEY was the first to introduce the Art of Photography in this city. GURNEY has recently made important alterations and improvements in his establishment. GURNEY has now greater facilities for producing finer work in every branch than has heretofore been produced in this country. GURNEY has still in his employ the best of his old artists. GURNEY has recently added to the above a talented corps of American, French, and German artists. GURNEY'S colored Photographs of all sizes need only to be seen to be appreciated; they speak for themselves. GURNEY'S plain, unretouched Photographs were never equaled—so say artists and the best judges. GURNEY'S Daguerreotypes are universally pronounced superior productions. GURNEY has received more testimonials for his skill than any other artist in the profession. GURNEY received the only medal for Photographic productions at the late Paris Exposition—consequently, GURNEY stands at the head of the world in the Photographic Art. GURNEY has not removed any branch of his business to any part of the city. GURNEY has no connection with any other establishment in any part of the city. GURNEY attends personally to his patrons and friends, and has done so for the last sixteen years. GURNEY will be most happy to continue that attention, and will still endeavor to please all who may favor him with a visit to his Photographic Palace of Art. J. GURNEY,

FACTS

THAT NEED NO MARKING.

Progression.

From Humphrey's Photographic Journal of Sept. 1856.

We do not approve of the plan of puffing the members of the Photographic profession by way of personals. This may do very well when one is trying to bring his works into favor with such as are susceptible to flattery, and measure out their support according to the amount of editorial ink used as bait. We feel confident that those who best know will agree with us as that it is no puffing, when we can say with so much truth, that the Photographic Art this day owes, in no small degree, its position in this country to Mr. C. D. FREDRICKS, a gentleman who was the first to introduce the Photographic process upon an extensive scale in America. Previous to his establishing himself here, he visited Europe, and, with an enterprise worthy of imitation, he was not satisfied with first securing what knowledge he could himself gain, but also engaged the services of several of the most eminent Parisian Artists. He then, in connection with Mr. GURNEY, opened an establishment on a plan unequaled in the world.

After succeesfully following his profession, in connection with Mr. G., for some time, he has opened a "Temple of Art" in this City, under his own professorship and supervision. We have honestly and candidly presented the foregoing, feeling that is justly due to a fellow-laborer.

CHARLES D. FREDRICKS, late GURNEY & FREDRICKS, Photographs, Daguerreotypes, Ambrotypes, &c., No. 585 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel.

FACTS WHICH ARE KNOWN.—PHOTOGRAPHS DAGUERREOTYPES, AMBROTYPES, &c.—The undersigned having removed the Photograph department and his Parisian artists from his old place of business, No. 349 Broadway, to his new and magnificent establishment, No. 585 Broadway, would call the attention of public to the fact that his Galleries, and the pictures made in them, are superior to anything before exhibited. Those desiring Photograps, Daguerreotypes, or Ambrotypes, executed by artists of refined taste, would do well to call and judge for themselves. Reception Rooms on the first floor, and are open from 8 A. M., to 10 P. M. CHARLES D. FREDRICKS,

European News.

By the City of Washington, arrived at Philadelphia, we have European dates to the 5th. The state of political affairs has not been materially changed since the arrival of the previous mails. The money market continues tight, and there was also a downward tendency in bread stuffs and cotton.

The Danubian Principalities.—The London Times' correspondent states that the influence of Russia in the Danubian Principalities increases from day to day. The same writer says that England is quite as inclined for the proposed conference as Austria.

The Black Sea.—A Vienna dispatch of the 2d instant, states that on the 23d of October, the Porte, together with England and Austria, had settled that the occupation of the Black Sea and Danubian Provinces should be prolonged. The British squadron at the Isle of Serpents had been reinforced.

France.—Discontent prevailed amongst the manufacturing districts of France from apprehended commercial reforms. Corn was declining at various points, although at Toulon, Borde aux and Marseilles, the average price was maintained. Private letters from Paris do not indicate any decided change in financial matters. Although the condition of the Bank is improved there is no return to confidence.

The Neapolitan Affair.—The Neapolitan squadron had not sailed from Toulon. The Neapolitan Minister remained at Paris, and showed no disposition to leave.

Spain.—A decree has been published in Spain establishing the laws of 1844 regarding the press.

Persia.—Constantinople advices state that the ultimatum of England has been forwarded to the Shah of Persia. The Persian besieging party of Herat had taken possession of the environs of that city, and were fortifying them. A later dispatch says that the Affghans have been defeated by the Persians, and 6,000 prisoners taken.

Wm. James Robson, convicted of frauds on the Crystal Palace stock in England, has been sentenced to twenty years imprisonment in a penal establishment.

A collision took place on the North Western Railroad, by which upwards of fifty persons were severely injured, some of them being frightfully mutilated.

BREAKING UP OF THE ANGLO-FRENCH ALLIANCE.

The Anglo-French alliance, says the Liverpool Post, may be considered as nearly at an end. Both countries are at an entire enmity on the Eastern question; and it is now admitted that the manœuvres of the French Government were successfully concentrated by the exertions of Lord de Redcliffe. It does not follow, however, that his lordship or the Government which approves of his conduct is right; but the inference is in their favor, for the British fleet still keeps the Black Sea, and is receiving augmentations. Austria and England are certainly agreed respecting the policy to be observed towards the Principalities; and if this fact required further confirmation, it will be found in the hostility of the French and Russian organs of this new alliance.

The Turkish problem, however, remains still to be solved. The liberal edicts obtained during the pressure of hostilities are comparatively nil. The measures, good in themselves, cannot be enforced, for the social and political machinery is wanted. "One of these edicts," says the Times, "admitted the Christians of the empire to give evidence in courts of justice; another, if our memory does not fail us, abrogated the law of capital punishment on the conversion of any Mohammedan to Christianity. How the former edict was acted upon, and what obedience to it obtained, we know from Dr. Sandwith, who describes, in his recent book, the proceedings of a court of justice in one of the provinces of Asiatic Turkey, and the gross ill-treatment of a Christian plaintiff, owning to the court only allowing Ottoman testimony, though the edict for the admission of Christian testimony had been out two years."

The force of the latter edict may be collected from the fact that Sir H. Rawlinson, in his speech at the late meeting of the "Turkish Aid Mission Society," describes the old law of capital punishment for conversion as still in force, which, no doubt, is practically the case. If this is all the result of Turkish edicts, it almost amounts to a confession that our diplomacy at the Ottoman Court for years past has been useless, so far as regards this object, and that we have been applying all our skill and weight to move a machinery that does not move Turkey.

What is to be done, inquires the Times, in the absence of a natural medium for moving Turkey—i. e., when the Government is almost ineffectual for that purpose? Is there any other medium which can be used for that purpose besides the Government, and is there any other influence which can be exerted when diplomacy has failed? Dr. Hamlin, in his speech a day or two ago at the meeting of the Turkish Aid Society, tells us that this is not a case for diplomacy and Government communication, but for popular means of influence and methods of action.

RUSSIAN VIEW OF THE ANGLO-AUSTRIAN ALLIANCE.

(From the Le Nord.)

We cannot avoid mentioning a fact which, in our opinion, is a most important one. Russia is the object of an accusation from the Cabinet of London, and probably also from that of Vienna, which, in this question, goes hand and hand with England. And on what does the accusation bear? It cannot be the affair of Belgrade, for Art. 20, of the treaty at Paris, is formal on that head. It can, therefore, only be the question of the Isle of Serpents. But the declarations of the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh have been so clear and categorical on the subject of that isle, that it would be really an insult to our readers to recur to them. We may, nevertheless, remark, that this Cabinet has repeated to satiety that that islet could never become the subject of any dispute, since Russia had always had possession of it without the slightest objection on the part of Turkey, since it could never become a strategical point of any importance, and its only value to Russia was that lying on the road to Odessa, it served to keep up a light-house, which is indispensable to the numerous vessels going to that port. Russia besides has declared, and it is the principal point in the whole affair, that she referred this question to the Congress of Paris. Since therefore Russia only sent her six soldiers there, because foreigners had come to take possession of a light-house which belonged to her, was it not natural, supposing both parties to be animated with equally conciliatory feelings. that things should be allowed to remain in statu quo until the decision of the Congress, by the authority of which, when once admitted by all, that the settlement of questions arising out of the late war, could not be disputed? What, however, do we now see? Scarcely has Russia declared that she will accept in good faith the decision that may be come to in common by all, than England and Austria refuse to submit to that decision, and, by so doing, deny the competence of the Congress. In other words, the Cabinets of London and Vienna, for reasons which we will not at present examine arrogate to themselves the right of deciding by themselves questions which properly belong to all the powers that signed the treaty of Paris, and in which they are, strictly speaking, both judges and parties.

The royal mail steamship Niagara, from Liverpool to Boston, Nov. 8, brings dates from Europe three days later than the preceding news received by the Washington.

There is little important news by this arrival.

Additional symptoms had manifested themselves of a close union between France, Russia and Prussia. It would appear that France supports the unconditional admission of Russia and Prussia to the second meeting of the European Conference, while England is said to oppose the admission of the former and Austria the latter.

Treaties of commerce between Russia and France, and railway treaties between Russia and Prussia, were in preparation.

Neapolitan affairs continued without change.

There had been nothing of interest received from Spain.

On Thursday evening, the 6th instant, the Directors of the Bank of England held a protracted sitting, in the course of which they deliberately considered the expediency of making a further change in the rates of discounts, with a view to arrest the continued outflow of gold to the Continent. The withdrawal of a considerable amount during the last few days, and the certainty that the demand must continue unless it be interrupted by large arrivals from Australia, are understood to have engaged the attention of the Board, and the resolution not to make any change for the present was arrived at by a majority of only one.

The condition of the Bank of France had shown no improvement.

Admiral Dundas was still at Malta at last advices, which are to Oct. 31.

Cape of Good Hope advices of Oct. 3rd, say that fears of a Caffre war are passing away.

The British Government advertises at Lloyds for a ship to convey some hundreds of emigrants to Nova Scotia, it being the intention to grant free passages to laborers and their families to that colony.

In Lord Palmerston's speech at Machester, he used the following expression, which has been the subject of much report:—"I hope the peace will be lasting, but its endurance must depend on the fidelity with which its conditions are fulfilled. If that power which provoked hostility faithfully carried out the treaty, then, no doubt, peace would be preserved."

By a letter from Vienna, in the Cologne Gazette, we learn something about the diplomatic correspondence which resulted from the intention of Russia to erect new fortifications on the Finnish coast, in the Bothnian Gulf. We are told that this matter has come to an amicable understanding, as far as the relations of the French Government to Russia are concerned, but the British Government, it is said, still maintains that in these fortifications there is an invasion of the articles of the Treaty of Peace, by which the erection of fortifications on the Aland Islands is interdicted. Count Morny is represented as having declared to Prince Gortchakoff, in reply to a direct question, that France had no objection to the erection of the proposed fortress.

The new Turkish Ministry is reported as follows:—Grand Vizier, Reschid Psha; Minister of War, Omar Psha; Minister of Marine, Red Pasha; Minister of Finance, Saffette Pasha. In the meantime Faud Pasha will hold the Portfolio of Foreign Affairs until Ali Pasha, to whom it has been offered, consents to accept it.

The Emperior Alexander has addressed a letter to General Luders, granting him leave of absence for a year. One expression in it has attracted attention. The Emperor says:—"Appreciating your efficient services, I hope, if circumstances give me occasion to recall you to employment before the expiration of the period named, you will come to resume your duties with the zeal and alacrity which have ever signalized your military career."

In France rumors continue of a probable modification in the Ministry. It is said that M. De Persigny's visit to the Emperor is connected with these rumors.

The Emperor continues the revels at Compiegne, where his third and last batch of guests have just arrived, including the Ministers of Russia, Sweden and Holland, and Marshals Pelissier and Baraguay D'Hilliers.

These protracted country entertainments give offence to the Parisians, and among the placards surreptitiously posted on the walls are some headed "Le Roi Samus." The celebrated painter, Paul de Roche, is dead. He was 59 years of age

LORD PALMERSTON ON THE AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES.

In an address presented to Lord Palmerston by the President of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, the follow passage occurred:—

"It would not be doing justice to the commercial community of Liverpool, were no mention made of that question which most deeply affects it—the late difficulties or threatened difference between this country and the United States. There is, my Lord, but one expression of feeling among us as to the manner in which your Lordships and her Majesty's advisers disposed of that, which at one time threatened to be a question that might involve us in a desperate contest with America. We feel, by the mode in which your Lordship and her Majesty's advisers settled that question, you not only consulted the dignity of this country, but in spirit, and, in fact, satisfied all the interests concerned. My Lord, for that we feel deeply indebted to your Lordship and to her Majesty's Government."

To this Lord Palmerston replied, with considerable embarrassment of manner, as follows:—

"I was sure, gentlemen, that the policy which we recently adopted in our difference with the United States must meet with your approbation. We felt, that while, on the one hand, it was necessary to maintain the dignity of the country, that it was also necessary to show that even the calamities of war with a neighboring race would be encountered if there was a necessity for it upon adequate grounds. We felt that, while it was necessary to show this, we ought to waive all minor and party considerations—that we ought not to take advantage of circumstances which might, perhaps, have justified the expression of angry feelings, that it was more dignified to look at what we believed to be the friendly feeling of the great mass of the people of the United States, rather than to take too much notice of circumstances in a narrower sphere that might, perhaps, have justified feelings of irritation. The result has fully borne out, I think, the wisdom of that course. I am sure that in proportion as our prosperity increases, and in proportion as our enterprise is developed, in the same proportion we may look to cementing permanently those ties of friendship and good will which exist, and ought to be perpetuated between the people on the two shores of the Atlantic."

A FRENCH MENACE TO ENGLAND.

In a semi-official article in the Constitutionel, on the questions at issue between France and England, that journal says:—"The presence of the Naval Squadron of England in the Black Sea, and of the Austrians in the Principalities, are henceforth only an arbitrary and violent means of preventing a solution of the difference which Russia has been the first to propose in offering to submit the question to its natural judges. Is it desired rather to have recourse to arms? Is war again desired? Does the English Ministry itch to enter again upon hostilities without France—not certainly to assure the execution of the treaty of Paris, but impudently to rend it to pieces in the face of the world, with the object of satisfying an ambition that had been for the moment disguised. We repeat, it now depends upon the Cabinets of London and Vienna to put an end to the pending disputes, and to terminate the anxieties to which the present situation gives rise. Let the consent to the reassembling of the Plenipotentiaries be given without making arbitrary and inadmissable exclusiveness a condition—exclusiveness which would completely change the character, and be an additional breach of the treaties. Let us add that, if a peaceful solution is desired, this is the only proposal for that purpose that can be decently made."

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

The Bulletin de Therapeutique contains a paper read by Dr. Esohschricht before the Physico-Medical Society of Wurtsburg, on the variation of the average duration of life in the different professions. From the statistics drawn up in Bavaria it appears that among the members of the medical profession the highest rate of mortality exists. Three fourths of the medical men die before the age of 50, and ten-elevenths before 60. Of 1,600 medical men in Bavaria in 1852 four only had passed the age of 80; and of these four none had devoted themselves to the practice of medicine exclusively. The united ages of the oldest ten physicians amounted to 792; while the united ages of the oldest ten in each of the other liberal professions presented the following numbers:—Roman Catholic priests, 878 years; professors in the schools, 875 years; Protestant ministers, 865 years; lawyers, 885.

An English surgeon has broached the idea that a strong indication of consumptive symptoms is to be found in a mark at the reflective edges of the gums, of a deeper color than the adjoining surface. The absence of this streak in men affected with inconclusive symptoms of consumption may, he says, be interpreted favorably in case of such suspicious indications, but in women rather less weight is to be attached to this negative sign. In the female sex the presence of the sign is almost conclusive evidence of the existence of tubercular elements in the blood; and when in either sex, it coincides with a pulse not materially altered in frequency, but change from the sitting to the standing posture, the presence of the phthisis may, without having recourse to asculation, be assumed.

THE FRENCH PRESS ON ENGLAND.

From the Gazette de France.

The conduct of England since the cessation of the Crimean war, affords a subject of profound reflection to the civilized world, and it is impossible that France, in remarking this conduct, can refrain from casting a bitter glance at the past. But let us first examine the present. How is it that Europe does not enjoy at this day that perfect security, that confidence in the future, which should have followed the conclusion of a peace procured by the moderation of France and the resignation of Russia? This is caused alone by England, who entered the Congress of Paris without attempting to disguise her disinclination, and was, so to say, compelled by the unanimous will of the continental nations. She, therefore, in taking part in the pacific conferences spread the seeds of war and of revolution. If we are at this day in a financial crisis which threatens every fortune, if the springs of trade are rusty, if the social existence is troubled, these circumstances proceed from the precipitate confidence of the public in the conclusion of peace. But how could it have been imagined that the decisions of a Congress would have been openly violated by two of the contracting powers? The fault of our merchants and capitalists has been to have trusted England. It may be affirmed without contradiction that if England had not stirred up the embers of the conflagration which ravaged Italy in 1848, if she had not supported Austria in the indefinite occupation by that Power of the Danubian provinces, in order to be justified in occupying the Black Sea with her own vessels, Europe would at this day enjoy profound peace. Thus, one nation has arrested the development of universal civilization, and obstructs the expansion of wealth and the welfare of the working classes.

From the Assemblee Nationale.

We differ from the opinions of the Constitutionel on only one point. Our cotemporary appears surprised at the pretentions of Austria and England, which it combats, while we are only surprised that they have been advanced so soon. We had certainly not believed that matters would proceed so rapidly. There is even a display of clumsiness on the part of the Cabinets of Vienna and London in thus unveiling their secret plans, and we recognize in this conduct the turbulence of Lord Palmerston rather than the habitual temporization of the statesmen of Austria. But we had never doubted that the idea of England was to obtain possession of the Black Sea, and to establish herself there on the ruins of the Russian navy. It was even clearer to our eyes that the desire of substituting her influence in the Principalities for that of Russia was the mainspring of the resolutions of Austria. When we saw peace concluded on the conditions which in a certain measure were laid down by France, we did not believe that those projects were abandoned, but we repeat that we had not expected to see them brought to light in so short a space. These intentions are clear enough to-day. England, who openly regreted eight months ago that the war had not lasted long enough to demand a port in the Black Sea, a footing in Asia Minor, intends to remain at least in that sea, the neutrality of which does not satisfy her. Austria, again, is not contented with the free navigation of the Danube.

The intentions of the two powers cannot be misinterpreted.

But what is the attitude of the Porte? Amid the contradictions of the Vienna and Paris journals, the question admits of no solution, and, notwithstanding the rapidity of the means of communication, some days will probably pass before we become acquainted with its intentions. But were even the Divan to give way before the pretensions of England and Austria, it would not follow, in our opinion, that France is compelled to acquiesce in them. The late war was not waged in order to substitute the influence of Austria and England for that of Russia. Should Turkey fall so low as to submit to this double occupation, this species of disguised dismemberment at the moment when her independence has been placed under the guarantee of all Europe, we should be more justified in protesting, in the name of those principles for which we have lavished so much blood and treasure. France demands nothing in the Black Sea nor in the Principalities. But it does not follow that her disinterested policy is to be turned against her for the advantage of others. This appears to be the opinion of the Government, and we are happy to agree with it on this point. With respect to the Danubian Provinces, it is necessary, in order to proceed to a study of the new organization which has been promised them, that their territory be completely evacuated by the Austrian troops. This necessity was proclaimed by the whole world six months ago, and were France alone to demand the evacuation to-day, we have no doubt she would obtain it.

From the Union.

While the claims of this unfortunate (Turkish) Government appear to attract very little attention, the pressure of the embassies redoubles. It is a struggle of influence, which undermines the Ministry, and leads to resignations. Ali Pasha, and Fuad Effendi, being menaced, offer to resign, and only recall their resignations on receiving a letter of approval from the Sultan. Redschid Pasha agitates under a well-known influence and with a spirit of bravado. Omar Pasha becomes the favorite candidate of England, and aspires to the Seraskierat, from which issues the order that sent him into a species of exile. Such, in a word, is the state of matters which, grave enough in itself, promise to give rise to future complications from the fact of the unity of opinion which reigns between England and Austria on most of the Eastern questions. In the midst of these somewhat suspicious reconciliations what becomes of France? By a singular contrast, it appears that on all the questions in which she was of the same opinion as England at the termination of the Congress, she now differs. The immediate evacuation, the union of Moldavia and Wallachia, form to-day a subject of dissention. Now, it is not France that has changed, and certainly this consideration should lead her to reflect. For our part we are not surprised at present events, and have for some time past entertained our suspicions, which we hope that England will not confirm.

American News.

We have received a letter from Michigan, dated Nov. 11th, 1856, which gives the following facts :—The steamboat Superior, from Chicago for Lake Superior, and owned by Spencer & Co., of Chicago, was wrecked on the Pictured Rocks, about the 3rd or 4th of the present month. These Rocks run for a distance of 18 miles, and terminate at the entrance of the Grand Island harbor, which is about 130 miles from here, the northern part of the island being about 40 miles from Marquette. She was an old boat, and had been on this route three summers ; she was commanded by Capt. Hiram J. Jones, than whom a more singularly unfortunate man is rarely to be met. About seven years ago he lost the Franklin at Thunder Bay ; he lost the Albany in the winter or fall of '53, at Presque Isle ; in '56 he had the E. K. Collins destroyed by fire in the Detroit river, near Maldon, and in '56 he lost the Superior in Lake Superior, and with her, himself. The Superior had a large amount of freight for the various points on the Lake, besides passengers and crew, to the number of 80 or 90. Fifteen made their escape, at least survived the wreck, for they know not by what miraculous agency they are alive, and their description of the heart-rending scene is truly painful to hear. The fifteen saved consisted principally of the crew, the captain, clerk, steward, engineers being lost ; and as the books, &c., of the boat are also lost, it will be impossible to ascertain the correct number who found a watery grave, or anything further about them. The first mate was saved, and, like others, had suffered severely from his feet and hands being frozen. He says Capt. Jones performed his duty like a man ; that the storm was such that, from the disabled and leaky state in which she had been for hours before she was driven on the rocks, all hope of safety had been given up ; that Jones told him, as he had lost three boats before he would lose himself with the fourth ; but, said the poor fellow, "Tell my poor mother I've done my best." His body had been picked up by the General Taylor, close to the wreck, and is now on board that boat, to be given over to his widowed mother and orphan daughter in Detroit. The body of a female was also picked up close by the captain's. She was unknown, and was interred here shortly after the arrival of the General Taylor, this afternoon. This is the most melancholy accident that ever happened on Lake Superior, and it is to be sincerely hoped that the day is far distant which will witness such another catastrophe on any water. The propeller L. B. Webb, had been slightly injured near Grand Island, during the storm which wrecked the Superior ; the Webb put into Grand Island ; her captain sent a boat's crew, under the first mate, down to this place for some things he wanted ; the first mate, whose name is Lester, acted without the necessary precaution in this climate, that is, he acted too fool-hardy, and the consequence is, that he was frozen to death. His remains are also on board the General Taylor, to be handed over to a young wife in Detroit.

Gen. Garland, U.S.A., accompanied by his aid, arrived at St. Louis, says the Republican of 12th instant, a day or two since, from New Mexico. The Indians of that Territory are, we learn, comparatively quiet, and begin to have a proper appreciation of the strength of our military force. General Garland has been engaged in active service in the military department of New Mexico for more than three years, and has done much towards bringing the Indians to a proper respect for the whites. He is on his way to the East.

ANTIQUITY OF HOOPS.

From the Pittsburg, (Pa.,) Saturday Chronicle.

If there were no better evidence of the shallowness of fashion, the entire lack of invention among its leaders would be sufficient.

Scarcely has a generation passed away, until their habit, the subject of many a witticism, suddenly becomes the ruling mode. The bell crowned hat, that has excited the risibilities of many an effeminate fop, now covers his own shallow pate. The standing collar of our ancestors, forgotten for a term, again threatens to lop off the ears of a succeeding generation. Stump toed boots, disappearing for a century, are once more the rage ; and among the gentler sex the old forgotten hoop is trundled out again.

As many may be ignorant of the antiquity of this now prevailing fashion, they may be enlightened when they are informed that over two hundred years ago they were the subject of Addison's keen satire, when they were familiarly known by the now obsolete term of farthingale ; and among the Italians by a term expressing the peculiar necessity which gave rise to their adoption. Restricted to their legitimate use, which would prescribe a proper limit to their size, they might have passed without exciting the ludicrous comments that have been made on them. But like every change in style, when it gets into the hands of those who dress not to express good taste, but to display their vanity, it has become so greatly exaggerated that it is impossible for many, on seeing the enormous proportions of some who thus abuse it, to repress at least a "slow wise smile."

"You know, sir," said Addison, "it is recorded of Alexander the Great, that in his Indian expedition, he buried several suits of armor, which, by his directions, were made much too big for any of his soldiers, in order to give posterity an extraordinary idea of him, and make them believe he had commanded an army of giants. I am persuaded that if one of the present petticoats happens to be hung up in any repository of curiosities, it would lead into the same error the generations that lie some removes from us, unless we can believe our posterity will think so disrespectfully of our grandmothers that made themselves monstrous to appear amiable. When I survey this new fashioned rotunda in all its parts, I cannot but think of the old philosopher, who, after having entered into an Egyptian temple, and looked about for the idol of the place, at length discovered a little black monkey enshrined in the midst of it, upon which he could not forbear crying out, to the great scandal of the worshippers—'What a magnificent palace is here for such a ridiculous inhabitant.'"

Irish News.

A Letter from Wm. Smith O'Brien.

In answer to an invitation to attend a public banquet in Dundalk, given on the 6th inst., by the people of Louth, to Tristram Kennedy, Esq., M. P., Mr. O'Brien, addressed the following letter to the Secretary :

"Cahirmoyle, Ardagh, Newcastle West,
Oct. 29th, 1856.

"Dear Sir—I have had the pleasure of receiving your most obliging letter of the 24th inst., by which, in terms the most complimentary, you invite my attendance at the banquet which is to be given on the 5th November, to Mr. Tristram Kennedy, Member for the County Louth.

"If I had not prescribed to myself, as a rule of conduct best suited to the present circumstances of my position and to my opinions, abstinence from participation in political movements, I should have had great pleasure in accepting this invitation. I should have attended the banquet in order to testify my respect for Mr. Kennedy and the constituency which he represents. Though I have but a slight acquaintance with Mr. Kennedy, and though, in consequence of my absence from Ireland, I have not been able to watch attentively the votes of the Irish members, I have seen enough of his public conduct to justify me in believing that he is a faithful and honest representative of the Irish people.

"I also approve of the policy of Parliamentary independence of which he continues to be an advocate. I am convinced that if the Irish members were, as a body, to hold themselves aloof from all connection with English governments, there is no political advantage which they might not secure for their country—not excepting the restoration of the Parliament of Ireland.

"I am not insensible to the force which lies in the argument of those who say that the Irish are entitled, as long as Ireland shall be connected with England, to a fair share of the administrative patronage of the empire ; but it seems to me that this legitimate object can be obtained without degrading the representation of Ireland by rendering them factors or brokers for the acquisition of situations for their constituents.

"Let the Irish nation advocate and maintain the principle that all offices ought to be bestowed, not as rewards for political tergiversation, but as the honorable recompense of services rendered to the state, and charge their representatives with the task of enforcing this principle, rather than with that of trafficking for the benefit of influential individuals, and it will soon be seen that Ireland will obtain her fair share of all situations of emolument in the empire.

"To a certain extent this has been admitted by those who, in and out of office, advocate administrative reform. Entrance into official life is now to be obtained in several departments of the state, by merit and capacity, ascertained by public examination. The recent examinations have shown that in this competition Irishmen are successful far beyond the proportion which the population of the kingdom would indicate. Why should not this principle, which has already been found capable of useful application in lower grades of official stations, be applied to the higher ranks? Every one can name individuals of the highest merit in the various professions, who have been neglected, because they would not stoop to solicitation. If there were a healthy state of public opinion, with reference to such matters in this country, no government would dare to leave unnoticed the deserving, or to purchase the votes of the representatives of the people, by promoting those who had nothing to recommend them, except what is well known by the name of 'Parliamentary interest.'

"For my own part, I have no hope that Ireland will be respected among the nations of the earth, until the Irish representatives shall be regarded as a pure and incorruptible body ; and this will never be the case until the constituencies of Ireland shall select men in consideration of their capacity and uprightness, rather than on account of their dexterous manipulation, or of their pliability to the influences of ministerial management.

"It is because I believe Mr. Kennedy to be one of those who are desirous to uphold the honor and interests of the Irish nation, rather than to allow our country to be jobbed, as a provincial farm, for the benefit of England, that I would willingly award to him whatever amount of homage my attendance could testify ; and it is because his constituents set a useful example to the rest of Ireland in upholding an independent representative, that I would feel proud of becoming their guest on the occasion.

"I have the honor to be your obliged, faithful servant,
"William Smith O'Brien."

Speaking of the Merrimac steam frigate, the Waterford News says :—"Not the least interesting incident in connection with her is, that her commander (Prendergast) is the son of an Irishman, and that Irishman was a native of our own city of Waterford. This information is from the lips of the commander himself, who last week paid a visit to his father's native city, for the purpose of seeing a cousin of his now living amongst us. Mr. M. Prendergast, iron merchant, Barronstrand-street. Such a fact is only another instance of the inherent genius of the Irish race, who are every day exhibiting themselves in the foremost ranks of life all over those countries where their nativity is not fettered.

Speaking of the Agricultural Exhibition which is to be held in Waterford next year, the Dublin Nation says—the Exhibition promises to be the most attractive and remarkable held in Ireland. Not merely will it be equal or superior to those of the Dublin Society in its display of domestic produce, animals, and implements—Waterford has besides invited All Nations to exhibit on the shore of the Suir, and expects to see Norman bulls and Spanish sheep beside the cows of Kerry and the mutton of Meath. In Paris, his Worship had a highly gracious interview with the distinguished official who superintends the Department of Agriculture—and the French Government have undertaken to send not merely a display of the various cattle of France and the agricultural implements in use throughout the country, but to send them in charge of peasants from the various districts, in their respective provincial costumes. A French Commission will also report upon the Exhibition. We have reason to know that this remarkable favor was conceded with the best grace by the representative of the French Government, and with expressions of great good will towards Ireland. A similar application was made at the Spanish Embassy, and entertained with particular, courteous, and zealous attention by the Secretary of Legation, Don P. Comyn, a gentleman who is nobly proud of his Irish descent. The American Ambassador, in a similar spirit, most frankly and warmly promised his services to the project, and though unable to offer any official assistance from his Government, communicated with a warm recommendation the nature of the design to the authorities of the various States. It is hoped that the Belgian Ministry will also assist the project with its usual enlightened liberality.

On the 29th ult. a Maritime School was opened in Limerick. We have been given to understand, says the Tipperary Vindicator, that two classes will be immediately formed, and that the hours of attendance will be, for the first class, from four o'clock to six, p.m., and for the second class, from seven to nine, p.m. These classes will be open gratis, as well, we understand, to the pupils of the National Schools as to the pupils of all the other seminaries in the city, who may think proper to avail themselves of the benefit which may be derived from a naval education. Natural astronomy, navigation, and mathematics will be taught by Mr. Murphy, a most efficient master, practically taught at Greenwich for the especial purposes of this school. All the necessary scientific requisites for the instruction of the pupils have been supplied and sent down by the Board of National Education. The Leamie Institution, in which this school has been opened pro forma, will be only temporarily occupied, as a site on which a school will be erected with an observatory adjoining it, has been taken in the immediate neighborhood of the Sailors' Home, which is at present being erected in Frederick street.

At the great Munster Fair, which commenced on the 30th ult., good milch cows were in great request, and fetched from £15 to £16. Calves of good description were equally sought for, and were bought up at most remunerative figures. A bull of the ordinary description was purchased for £30, which was considered an enormous price. There was great request for all such cattle, the average prices being £15 for the common run. Stores were not so brisk in demand as fat cattle. Milch cows and good calves were in excellent condition. There was neither demand nor price for anything of an inferior description.

Amongst a series of entertainments, says the Cork Examiner, given by Francis R. Leahy, Esq., on the occasion of the visit of the Earl of Cork to his estates in this country, was an evening concert at Shanakiel House, to which a distinguished party comprising the rank and fashion of the city were invited. The programme of the entertainment was chosen with great taste, and included selections from the operas of "Norma," "Il Barbiere," "La Semiramide," &c. The artists were, the Misses McCarthy, Messrs. Blake, Reeves, J. Roche, A. D. Roche.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. H. Keogh, of Kilbride, county of Carlow, has been appointed resident magistrate in place of the Hon. Martin French, resigned. The Lord Lieutenant has conferred a good service pension of £100 a year upon Nicholas Kelly, Esq., resident magistrate at Ballinamore, county Leitrim, as a mark of his Excellency's approbation of Mr. Kelly's services in reference to the discovery and bringing to justice of the murderers of Miss Hinds.

An internal abscess, which had annoyed Mr. Robson, the comedian, for a considerable time, and had often caused him the worst apprehensions, suddenly burst while he was rehearsing a part on the stage of the Dublin Theatre. Everybody was much alarmed at the time, but under skilful medical treatment the favorite actor was able in a night or two to resume his performances.

Among the petitions presented to the Encumbered Eestates Court during the last week of October was another of the Sadleir property, yearly value £209 15s. 9d., with an incumbrance of £15,000! The total amount of nett rental posted for sale up to the 7th of February next reaches £60,000 per annum, probably representing a capital of £1,200,000.

The corporation of Waterford are making an effort to light Ballybricken with gas.

The Earl of Brandon, died of apoplexy at his seat, Castle Bernard, on the 31st ult.

On this day, (29th ult.,) says the Loughrea correspondent of the Dublin Freeman, about half-past ten o'clock, John O'Hara, Esq., the sub-sheriff of the county, preceded by a force of 40 police (although it is alleged he sent a requisition for only a dozen,) under the command of Mr. Walker, S.I.P., and in charge of Mr. Higgins, H.C., passed through this town to the estate of Dartfield, to put into execution a civil bill ejectment decree against John Egan, he being one out of three against whom ejectment decrees were obtained at the last quarter sessions of Ballinasloe. The other two tenants having given up possession of their holdings, were re-admitted as caret kers; but this man refusing to act similarly, the present severe step was taken against him. Upon the arrival of the sheriff and police, there was not—like this time last year—any attempt at resistance. No persons were present, save the poor women of the village, whose piercing cries rent the air, and formed a dire contrast to the joyous notes of the huntsmen's bugle, and the cry of the county fox-hounds that were passing at the time of possession being taken from John Egan. By this event, Egan, his mother, and two children, were put out of doors, and the house levelled to the ground by the baliffs and their assistants, who were all engaged in this town for that purpose. The barn attached to John Egan's house, and wherein one of the families evicted last November, was suffered by him to reside, was also taken possession of, and demolished in the same manner as the dwelling-house.

As the Chester and Holyhead Company's express boat, the Cambria, Captain Warren, which left Holyhead for Kingstown, on the 29th ult., neared the Kish bank, she perceived a large brig in distress, with her ensign "union down" in the main rigging, her rudder gone, and her hull more or less damaged. The Cambria at once bore down towards her, when she perceived the brig's boat, with six of the crew in it, calling out for assistance, and saying the brig was in a sinking state, having six feet of water in her hold. Captain Warren immediately got the crew on board, and at once proceeded to get the brig in tow. She turned out to be the brig Eliza, of Dundee, 245 tons, Mr. Farquhar Finlayson, master, bound from Liverpool to Genoa, with a valuable cargo of iron, crates, and cotton on board.

The solemn and impressive ceremonial of the profession and reception of four young ladies, who entered the Order of the Sisters of Mercy, took place on the 25th ult., at Loughrea. The ceremony commenced with the reception of three postulants, who were invested with the white veil by the venerable Bishop of Clonfert, the Right Rev. Dr. Derry. Their names were—Miss Davy, daughter of Thomas Davy, Esq., Curragh; Miss Dillon, niece of the late Archdeacon Dillon, Ballinasloe; and Miss Hall, of London. After the conclusion of this ceremonial, Miss Louisa Smyth, second daughter of James Smyth, Esq., Masonbrook, made her solemn vows in a clear, distinct tone, and received the black veil.

The Clonmel Chronicle states that on the evening of the 26th ult., as Michael Kenna, tenant to Hugh William Bradshaw, J.P., Philipstown House, was returning from the village of Emly, towards Duncummin, where he lived, he was waylaid by a man, who struck him several blows on the head with a blunt instrument, and then escaped across the fields. His skull was fractured in various places, and when the unfortunate man was found, he was bleeding profusely, and lying on the road-side. Medical assistance was promptly procured; but he sank rapidly, and died on Monday evening. No arrest has yet taken place; but every exertion is being made by the authorities to have the guilty parties made amenable.

Two provisional battalions, says the Limerick Chronicle, are to be concentrated in this garrison—the first to be commanded by Colonel Stack, with the 9th, 16th, and 17th depots; the second to be formed under Lieutenant Colonel O'Halloran, and to be composed at present, of the 11th and 20th depots. Lieutenant Colonel O'Halloran is a very experienced officer, and entered the service in 1808. He is son to the late General O'Halloran, of this city, and is married to the niece of the distinguished General Sir R. Williams, commanding Royal Artillery at Woolwich.

The Cork Constitution reports that several parties were drinking in a public house at Carrigtwohill, amongst whom were two men named Murphy and a man named Denis Shea. These three persons retired to a yard situate at the back of the house, and while there, a dispute arose among them, in which it appears that Shea struck one of the Murphys. The two of these then attacked him, and beat him so severely that he died in a few hours. The Murphys were arrested, and detained to await the result of a coroner's inquiry.

Mr. Macdonough, Q.C., again visited the constituency of Carrickfergus, in order to ascertain more particularly than he was able to do on his previous visit, the sentiments of the constituency in regard to matters in which they are at present deeply interested. He waited on the Very Rev. Dean Bull, and several other influential men of the district, and his reception by all parties, was of the most flattering kind. There is little doubt of his return at the approaching election.

Monsieur le Commandant Dech, says the Waterford News, stepfather of N. A. Power, Esq., J.P., Bellview, and P. W. Power, Esq., J.P., Pembrokestown, and brother-in-law of Colonel Snow, has been appointed by the special choice of the Emperor of France, to command his Majesty's life guards during the hunt at Compeigne, which will last fourteen days.

An establishment in connection with the Soupers' Ragged School in Waterford, and which was under the immediate supervision of a zealous clergyman of the establishment and some ardent ladies, has been shut up within the last few weeks, the inmates—principally young females—having either dwindled to nought or become ungovernable.

For the last fortnight, says the Limerick Chronicle of the 1st, we have had weather of the most beautiful description. Wheat sowing is going on rapidly, and large tracts of ground are being laid out for potatoes. The potato digging has turned out most luxuriant, without the slightest indication of disease or blight.

A valuable brood mare, the property of Thomas W. Jellico, Esq., was stabbed on the lands of Marehill, Limerick, and the poor animal, which was with foal, perished of the wounds inflicted upon her. A reward of £20 has been offered for the apprehension of the perpetrators of this outrage.

The Limerick papers state that Mr. Bernal left that city for Cork, where he goes specially for Mr. O'Brien, of the Grand Parade, to sell by auction one of the largest bookseller's stocks in the South of Ireland. So extensive and valuable is this stock, that its sale was likely to occupy an entire week.

At Limerick quarter sessions, the Knight of Glin was opposed by 36 creditors—his debts amounted to £3,500. Petition dismissed and remanded to gaol.

The Right Hon. Francis Blackbourne, Ex-Lord Chancellor of Ireland, has been appointed Lord Justice of the New Court of Appeals under the act of last session. The new court will hear all appeals from the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the Incumbered Estates Court, and will be composed of the Chancellor, the Lord Justice of Appeal, and any of the Common Law Judges that the Chancellor may call upon to sit with them. The new court will not sit until Hilary Term, as the new act does not come into operation until the 1st of January, 1857.

A Society of Catholic Irish have addressed a petition to the government of Mexico, through one of its consuls in the United States, asking permission to establish themselves in the territory of Mexico. The New Orleans Catholic Standard says:—This may afford a good opening for Irishmen who have been acclimated in New Orleans, to emigrate to another land where they will be treated less as an inferior caste than they are here.

A farmer named Patt Knee, near Gort, was in in the act of putting a roof on a barn, when one of the rafters gave way and the poor man was precipitated head foremost to the floor beneath. His skull was fractured, besides other contusions on his body. He is under the care of Dr. Nolan, but little hopes are entertained of his recovery.

The Cork Examiner of the 29th ult., states that an apple tree, the property of Mr. Andrew Moynahan, butter merchant, Watercourse, is at present producing fruit for the second time this season. The first crop appeared about the usual period, and afforded an average yield—while the present crop has already attained a considerable size.

Whilst the Macroom car was proceeding up George's street, Cork, the horses were suddenly brought to a stand, in consequence of which, constable Dudley, of the Coachford station, who occupied a seat on the car, was thrown on the ground, receiving a fracture on the right arm.

Mr. John Quinn, auctioneer, sold the lands of Cross, at Dobbyn's Hotel, in Waterford, by public auction, at the large sum of £1,120, or about twenty-four years' purchase. Mr. M'Cheasty, of Ballymorris, bid £1,115, and it was knocked down to Head Constable Thomas Doyle for £1,120.

Some of the sailors of the brig "Endeavor," Drogheda, set fire to the ropes in the hatch, and before the fire could be extinguished the decks had to be broken up, and her bottom opened, after which she immediately sank.

Correspondence.

Letter from Nicaragua.

GRANADA, October 21, 1856.

In my last letter I told you we expected to be attacked next morning. We were disappointed. The enemy had another plan, which was well laid, and was very near succeeding. General Walker, finding they would not advance to encounter our troops, determined on giving them battle. Consequently, on the 11th inst., at 11 o'clock, we were assembled on the Plaza, where Gen. Walker and Staff having made their appearance, we took up our line of march for Masaya, which is 16 miles from here, over a wretched road. In fact it can't be called a road. It is nothing but a path through the woods and marshes. Having rained copiously and continuously the previous night, we waded knee-deep in mud. Not two men could go abreast. Our artillery had to be carried on mules and oxen. We arrived at Masaya at 10 o'clock, P. M., hungry and thirsty, and lay down on the road-side, in the mud, to take a little sleep. We were very soon aroused, however, by an attack on our out-post, which was stationed near an old house which the enemy took possession of. There was a sharp conflict for some hours. Those of our men engaged were under the command of Capt. Russell, who came out with me. He did his duty like a man. He was hard pressed by the enemy, who several times charged the house; yet, he each time repelled them with slaughter. Barnacle, who was a member of the "Edward Fitzgerald Guard," was in his Company, and was shot in the arm. He is now nearly recovered. During most of this fighting I slept quite soundly. On the first shot being fired I sprang up, but finding I could not take any part in the conflict, I turned over and went to sleep as coolly as if I was in my old snuggery, 134 Bowery.

As the sun rose next morning, we were up and preparing for work. The foe took a look at us, and we bade them good morning with a booming shell, which scattered them in all directions. After a few shells had been thrown into the town, the First Rifles were ordered to charge. They did so, and took the small Plaza which the enemy abandoned on our approach. We halted there for about half an hour, and some of our lads were lucky in finding a breakfast ready, which had been cooked by the enemy. My Regiment and the 2d Infantry were then ordered to advance to the main Plaza, which was barricaded on every side and defended by cannon. We did so, under a sharp fire, without a chance of returning the "favor," as it came from behind the hedges and houses. After some time spent in this kind of fighting, we were recalled. Company B, 1st Infantry, which I belong to, was then ordered to advance on the right of Colonel Sanders, who was then advancing in another direction on the Plaza. We cut our way through, until we found ourselves far in advance. Captain Walters and I consulted then as to what we should do: he was in favor of returning, as we did not know the town, and might be cut off; while I urged that we should remain and send for orders. Ultimately he agreed with me, and the 2d Lieutenant with two men was sent to Gen. Hornsby for instructions. The General ordered us to advance as far as we possibly could. This we did, till within 20 yards of the barricade, which position we held until the army retreated. At this point we met a party of the enemy making for the barricade, upon whom I ordered our men to fire, which they did, killing some seven or eight. Our next move was to fortify ourselves in a house which I found on examination was capable of a good defense. I set all hands at loop-holing the walls which was soon done. Next I went to work and erected a barricade from our door, which would afford an opportunity for firing on the enemy. We had it just finished when they opened a masked battery, and soon demolished all our work. Our position was now a very critical one, for none of us knew the town or the number of the enemy, and we formed the extreme advance and right of our army, and were likely to be surrounded without a morsel to eat. Still no one murmured—no one feared. In this state we remained till about 2 o'clock, A. M., next day, when we got orders to return to where we started from.

The fighting in other parts of the town was hot during the day; but, as I had not an opportunity of seeing it, I shall not speak of it.

Now for the worst of it. The enemy, finding that Granada was weakly protected when we had left, attacked it and took possession of the entire city, except the Plaza, which was held by the citizens and a few men who were not able to march with us—numbering in all about 150. As soon as General Walker received this news, we started for Granada. The enemy had posted a strong force about two miles from the town on a slight elevation, which they barricaded and defended with two pieces of cannon. Their position commanded our approach. We approached within 200 yards before we knew of their presence. On their first fire we were commanded to fall into the bush. Dire confusion ensued. There was no one to form the men—no one to give any command. In view of this state of things, I went into the middle of the road, and asked the men if they would follow me? They did so, until we got another discharge of canister which made them again halt. I again got them to advance, and again they took to the bush. At this time John Walsh, one of our old companions of the "Edward Fitzgerald Guard," was shot in the neck. He stood by me all the time like a true man! Thank God he is recovering fast. After a pause, some one in the rear of our column said—"Why not charge?" The men asked, "Who will lead?" There was no reply. I then volunteered to lead them. They gave me a cheer, and we dashed at the barricade, bearing down all before us. Lieutenant Peters and I were the first who sprang at the enemy's cannon. We each pistolled our man, and thus ended the fighting on the road.

Our force then went into town on the run—six of them with myself dragging our prize cannon—a six-pounder—along with us. On arriving in the Plaza, finding that our enemy had possession of a house which commanded the middle of the Square, I took the six-pounder into the opposite building, double shotted it, and fired. Thereupon, they partially retreated. From the heavy charge which we put into the gun, it was dismounted. However, we tied it up, and again gave them a flavor of our "grape," which drove them out. This ended the fight on the Plaza

During all this, throughout the city our men had hard fighting—the enemy being in all the houses, and having barricades erected on the corners of the streets. They soon got beaten, however, threw down their arms, and ran in every direction.

The force that attacked Granada consisted of about 1000 Guatemalans and San Salvadorans, joined by some Chamoristas, who were for some time in the vicinity of Tipilapa, all under the command of General Savala. The number of killed and wounded is not known, as the enemy filled the wells and sinks with their dead. I should say there were some 400 killed and wounded. We took 65 prisoners—one a Colonel, second in command. The force in Massaya was said to be 3,000. Our force, all told, was about 900 men.

I snatch a few moments from the very brief time allowed for sleep to send you these few lines. I intended to say much more, but after marching, counter-marching, fighting, piquet duty, and in the midst of preparations for an immediate renewal of it all—for we march again on Masaya to-morrow—I can't do it. I continue to like this country well. When—peace is restored—our arrogant invaders duly punished—British interference scouted—the Red Star waves triumphantly over this rejuvenated Republic, and capital freely flows to us from every part of your glorious Confederation—then are we certain of an unexampled prosperity. As it is, Granada is a sacked city. Those fellows plundered everything while they had possession of it. They even appropriated my clothes, so that I have now left but the flannel shirt and pantaloons I fought and beat them in. I expected to have received the IRISH NEWS from you ere this. Tell Connor and all the rest of the boys, that I will write a long letter, for their special edification, when I can get time. Meanwhile, then and ever, I charge them and you to hold in fond remembrance—as I do each and all of you—your old friend and comrade,

M. FLOOD NAGLE.

HISTORY SET RIGHT—IRELAND NEVER CONQUERED.

To the Editor of the Irish News.

SIR: I have been reading in one of the journals a report of a lecture delivered in New-York, by Mr. Simms, respecting the high revolutionary claims and character of the gallant State of South Carolina. In it there is a passage, stating that while the Scotch and Germans of that state sided—in general—with the mother country, in the war of liberation, the French, and, above all, the Irish, ran with alacrity to defend their adopted flag against the arms of England. This is one of the many facts of which the race of Ireland should be eternally proud on this soil. I was going to say, it was all owing to the Celtic blood. But then those Scots—the Williams—are Celts too, by all accounts. My thoughts then went wandering from ethnology to history, and I came to another fact—still more important than the one I have mentioned—and the more curious that it is against the idea of almost all the historic writers and readers.

Philosophic historians tell you that the conditions of Scotland, whatever they are, are owing to the fact that the country was not conquered. Dr. Arnold used to say that the day of Bannockburn ought to be celebrated by the Scotch as national festival, and Athenree lamented as a national disaster. He meant, of course, that Scotland was not conquered, and that Ireland was. He ought to have known better. The truth being that it is Scotland which was conquered, and that Ireland never was. I say this in small caps.

Let us look to the facts of the old times. The Plantagenet pretension to the throne of Scotland, so gallantly resisted by William Wallace and others, began to be successful in the time of Henry VII., who gave his daughter to the King of Scotland, in the vehement desire of seeing a grand-child who should unite the crowns; and in the reign of Elizabeth, all Scotland—the poor young King, the nobles, the commoners, and the clergy—lay protestant and prostrate, under the feet of that bold, contriving woman. Then Scotland was conquered once for all. Religion, of course—the change which allowed the nobles and their followers to take all the Catholic Church lands—was the agency which took away Scotland's independence and made her one with England.

As regards Ireland, Elizabeth died a baffled woman. She laid the doughty Douglass on his back; but she could only bring Tirowen to his knee—and that was, no doubt, as much owing to his gallantry in respect of a female, as anything else—for that chief was a gay, wily sort of man. Except what was inside the Paling, all Ireland was resisting or rebellious to the heart's core; and inside the Pale was much the same. In 1715 and and 1745, a few of the Highland clans followed their chiefs in Scotland—fighting for the ambitious views of these last, and not for the Stewarts or for their country. (In this respect, I think Macaulay is right, for once). In 1782, the leader of Irish opinion stood up for independence; and in 1798, the Protestants and Catholics (if the former were on the whole numerically weakest, they must have the credit of having begun the business,) rose, with the ancient hatred of the O'Neills, O'Briens, and Moores, and so forth, and again advanced that old invincible plea. It is the very same, up to our own day, as everybody knows; and the fire still smoulders under the ashes.

Scotland was a conquered country, and her people show it at this day, as they did about two hundred years ago. Ireland, in spite of all the beatings she has got, has resisted, in almost every generation. She never behaved like a conquered country; never knew when she was beaten, and is very like to go on for some time longer, in that same old condition of ignorance—as the English moralists are so fond of saying.

I wish to set the historians right—for Ireland is not yet conquered, and never was. I also wish to have a good crow—but rather good humoredly, as this is Thanksgiving Day—over those Scotchmen who ignorantly pretend they were never conquered, and as ignorantly say the Irish were. With Christopher Sly, I bid them "look in the Chronicles." No wonder, indeed, that the Sawnies were on the side of the English in our 1775. They couldn't be anywhere else. They are never anywhere else, here or there. They are more English than the English themselves. Such was the rebellious virtue of Ireland, that she could make her adopted sons more Irish than her own children; and the charm does not seem to be yet lost. Conquest has so far quelled the Scots, that they do not show any remembrance of Wallace—any love of what he died for. They take to republicanism far less cheerfully than the English. Ireland's unconquered spirit led her children into the thickest of our revolutionary struggle, on the right side, and they still show themselves foremost under the colors of the republic, as everybody knows—and as John Bull saw, the other day, on the decks of the Merrimac in Southampton water. They really exhibit more signs of a conquering than a conquered people. It may be just as well they should all come away from the island to the continent. In any case, may they never more be "sick, sore or sorry," says

OLD CROSSBARRY.

THE CASTLE OF DONEGAL.

The ruins of the old castellated mansion of Donegal are not only interesting as affording, to use the words of Sir R. Colt Hoare, "a good subject for the pencil," but still more so as a touching memorial of the falling fortunes of a long-time powerful and illustrious family, the ancient lords of Tyrconnell. These ruins are situated on the north bank of the little river Easky, or the fisby river at the extremity of the town, to which, as well as to the county, it has given its name. This name, however, which signifies literally the Dun, or Fort of the Foreigners, is of much higher antiquity than the castle erected here by the O'Donnells, and was, there can be no doubt, originally applied to a fortress, most probably of earth, raised here by the Danes or Northmen anterior to the twelfth century; for it appears unquestionable that the Irish applied the appellation Gaill exclusively to the northern rovers, anterior to the arrival of the English. Of the early history of this dun or fortress there is nothing preserved beyond the bare fact recorded in the annals of Ulster, that it was burnt by Murtoch M'Loughlin, the head of the northern Hy-Niall race, in 1159. We have, however, an evidence of the connection of the Danes with this locality more than two centuries earlier, in a very valuable poem which we shall at no remote time present to our readers, addressed by the Tyrconnell bard, Flan Mac Lonan, to Aigleann and Cathbar, the brothers of Domhnall, from which the name of Donnell is derived. In this poem which was composed at the commencement of the tenth century, the poet relates that Egneachan, the father of O'Donnell, gave his three beautiful daughters, Duibhlin, Bebua, and Bebinn, in marriage to three Danish princes, Caithis, Torges and Tor, for the purpose of obtaining their friendship, and to secure his territory from their depredations; and these marriages were solemnised at Donegal, where Egneachan then resided.

But though we have therefore evidence that a fort or dun existed here from a very remote time, it would appear certain, from a passage in the Annals of the Four Masters, that a castle, properly so called, was not erected at Donegal by the O'Donnells till the year 1474. In this passage, which records the death of Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garve O'Donnell, at the year 1505, it is distinctly stated that he was the first who erected a castle at Donegal, that it might serve as a fortress for his descendants; and that he also erected, as it would appear, at the same time, a monastery for Observantine Franciscans near the same place, and in which he was interred in the seventy-eighth year of his reign. From this period forward the Castle of Donegal became the chief residence of the chiefs of Tyrconnell, till their final extinction in the reign of James I., and was the scene of many a pretty domestic feud and conflict. From a notice of one of these intense broils, as recorded in the Annals of the Four Masters, at the year 1564, it would appear that shortly previous to that period a tower called the New Tower, had been added to the older structure. This tower being at that time in the possession of Hugh, the grandson of the builder of the original castle, while the latter was inhabited by his fraternal nephews. Con, the son of Calvarch, then Prince of Tyrconnell, in the absence of his father, attempted to get possession of both, and nearly succeeded, when he was made captive by O'Neill.

Towards the close of the great war with the Earl of Tyrone in 1601, the castle, as well as the adjacent monastery, having been placed in the hands of the Queen's troops, through the instrumentality of Nial Garve O'Donnell, it was besieged and taken by the celebrated leader Red Hugh O'Donnell, who afterwards blockaded the English in the monastery, from the end of September to the end of October following. But though the besieged were reduced to the utmost extremity, in consequence of the explosion of their powder by some accident, which reduced the greater part of the monastery to ruins, they maintained their position with undaunted bravery, and O'Donnell finally raised the siege, and passed into Munster to join the Spaniards. It appears, however, from a contemporaneous poem, addressed to the ruins of this castle, that O'Donnell did not depart from his native territory, never to return, till he had reduced the proud castle of his ancient ancestors to a ruined pile, assigning as a reason that it should never become what its name indicated—a fortress for strangers!

Whether this castle was subsequently repaired or reconstructed by Red Hugh's brother Rory, the Earl of Tirconnell, during the few years for which he held his earldom previous to his flight to Rome, does not appear from any document which has fallen under our notice, and we are inclined to believe he did not do so. But be this as it may, the existing ruins retain no feature of a castle of the 15th century, but on the contrary are in every respect characteristic of the castellated residences of the reign of James I.: so that if it be of Rory O'Donnell's age, he must have rebuilt the mansion from its foundation. It appears, however, at least equally probable that the present structure may owe its re-erection to Sir Basil Brooke, to whom the grant of the castle was made in 1610. But it is certain at all events, that he repaired the castle and resided in it until his death, 1633; and two chimney-pieces which still remain are unquestionably of his time, as the arms on one of them testify. These arms, which are sculptured on two shields, are, on the first, those of Brooke impaling Leicester—the family name of Sir Basil's lady; and on the second, those of Brooke only. These chimney-pieces, which are very splendid specimens of the architectural taste of the age, are faithfully represented in the second volume of the Dublin Penny Journal, and are accompanied by an excellent notice from the pen, as we believe, of Sir W. Bentham. In this notice it is stated that the Castle of Donegal "was granted by patent, dated the 16th November, 1610, to Captain Basil Brooke, for twenty-one years, if he should live so long, with one hundred acres of land, and the fishing, customs, and duties extending along the river from the castle to the sea. Captain Brooke was knighted 2nd February, 1616, by Sir Arthur Chichester, knight, Lord Deputy, and had a re-grant of twenty-one years, or his life, of the castle by patent, dated 27th July, 1620, and on the 12th February, 1623, he had a grant of the fee of the castle for ever."

According to the same authority, this "Sir Basil Brooke was a scion of the family of Brooke of Norton, in Cheshire, and his lady was Anne, daughter of Thomas Leicester of Toft, in that county. Henry Vaughan Brooke, Esq., Member of Parliament for the county of Donegal, was his descendant and heir-at-law, who left the estates of his family to his nephew Thomas Grove, Esq., who took the name and arms of Brooke by royal sign-manual in 1808. He died without issue, and the estates of the family went to Thomas Young, Esq., of Lough Esk, who also took the name of Brooke by royal sign-manual, dated 16th July, 1830, and is the present possessor."

During the troubles of 1641, the Castle of Donegal was garrisoned for the king by Sir Henry Brooke, the son of Sir Basil; but was taken in May, 1651, by the Marquess of Clanricarde, who was joined by the Ulster forces under Sir Phelim O'Neil, when the O'Reilleys and MacMahons joined with him. But the castle was shortly afterwards abandoned by him, on receiving intelligence of the advance of Sir Charles Coote, into whose possession it then fell. Since that period the Castle of Donegal has never we believe, been used as a residence, and no care has been taken to save it from the ruined state in which it now appears. It is, however, to the credit of its present possessor that he has taken every care to delay as much as possible the further ravages of time on a structure so interesting in its associations with the past.

It is, indeed, impossible to look on this venerable pile without carrying our mind back to the days of its proud but unfortunate chiefs; and in our feelings of pity for their fate, indulging such sentiments as one of their last bards has attempted to express in the poem addressed to its ruins. It is a composition of Malmurry Mac-an-Ward, or the son of the bard, and was written on the demolition of the castle by Red Hugh O'Donnell in 1601.

THE BOOK OF LEINSTER.

From the Dublin Nation.

In verification and confirmation of the authenticity of our early annals, we procured extracts from some of the earliest Irish MSS. and bardic histories which remain in this country, and inserted occasional entries therefrom in the Table of Pestilences, for the purpose of showing the authorities upon which the annalists founded some of their assertions. These MSS. consist of prose tracts, poems, and fragments of history, all compiled anterior to the Twelfth Century, and chiefly contained in the "Book of Leinster," a large folio vellum MS. preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, and consisting at present of 350 pp. —a portion of a much larger work. The MS. was formerly known to writers and the learned, as "The Book of Glendalough." Mr. Curry states:

"Its contents are tracts on the early colonization of Ireland, the wars, battles, manner of death, &c, of her kings and great men; descending from the Pagan to the Christian times, and even down to the time of compiling the book. The prose tracts are summed up in poems generally, giving additional details by various authors, down to the days of Gilla na Naemh O'Duinn, a priest, and I believe tutor to Dermod MacMurrough. The greater part of the historical poems have relation to Leinster, but there are several on general Irish history and chronology. It contains besides, various very ancient romantic and historical tales, with pedigrees of Irish saints, as well as of the principal Irish families, and also the "Dinn Senchus," a topographical tract in verse, on the origin of the names of various remarkable places in Ireland. It originally contained a copy of the Wars of the Danes and Irish, which would be now of great value, but only one leaf remains. It is, in short, one of the most valuable of all our ancient Irish MSS., and must have been compiled in the early part of the life of Dermod MacMurrough, King of Leinster; before the time of the Anglo-Norman invasion—say about 1130. It is not necessary here to go into all the internal evidences of this probability contained in the volume itself, but the following memorandum will be deemed important and interesting, as it supplies an authentic date of sufficient proximity to that period for resting this opinion upon, as well as showing that the volume must have been the property of Dermod himself, at the time of writing it; for it is evident that the writer was an immediate author or attendant of MacMurrough. This entry is an insertion on the top margin of folio 200: 'O Virgin! it is a great deed that is done in Ireland this day, that is the fifth of the calends of August, viz: Dermod, the son of Donagh MacMurrough, King of Leinster and of the Danes, has been banished over the sea by the men of Ireland. Alas, alas! O Lord! what shall I do?'

"This occurrence took place A. D. 1167, and the men of Ireland here mentioned were those of Breifney and Meath, and the Danes of Dublin, with such of the Leinster men as had revolted and joined the standard of his enemy, Tiernan O'Rourke. There is even an earlier memorandum than his at the top margin of folio 27, A, which says: 'On yesterday, Donnell, son of Congalach O'Conor Faly, was killed,' &c. And the annals of the Four Masters, in the year 1161, thus fix the date of that event: 'Domhnall Ui Failge [Offaly] was slain by the clan Maclughra.'

"Now, any Irish scholar will perceive at once, that these insertions are as old as the times to which they refer, yet neither of them is in the hand-writing of the original scribe; clearly showing that they were events which took place, and entries made after the book had been written.

"Among the poems of most note, as affording references to pestilences, or the deaths of remarkable persons, is one commencing: 'You talented, learned men of Conn's land,' consisting of 104 lines, by Eochaidh O'Flinn, who died A. D. 984, describing the taking of Ireland by the heroine Cæsair, and afterwards by Partholan, with the names of the rivers and lakes of Ireland in Partholan's time, his own death, and the subsequent death of the colony that descended from him. Another is a poem of 148 lines, by Flann, of Monasterboice, who died A. D. 1056, on the deaths of the Tuatha de Danann chiefs, and begins: 'Listen, O you learned without blemish.' 'Noble Erin, Island of the Kings,' is a poem of 632 lines, on the Conquests and the Kings of Ireland, from the earliest time down to the introduction of Christianity, A. D. 432. It was one of the principal documents upon which O'Flatherty found his chronology. The writer, Giolla Caomhain, author of the 'Irish Nennius,' and who died A. D. 1072, also wrote another chronological poem of 220 lines, beginning with, 'All the annals hitherto.' This tract commences with the Creation, and subsequently carries down Irish history to the author's time. The poet divides his chronology into different eras, synchronizing the reigns of the Irish Kings, with the Assyrian and other dynasties, and giving the length of the reign of each monarch; thus endeavoring to carry back our chronology to the remotest times. Another poem in the same book begins: 'Noble Erin, Island of the Kings,' and described the reign and manner of the death of the Kings of Ireland before St. Patrick's time. It also contains a poem by Flann, of Monasterboice, on the manner of death of the Christian kings of Ireland, from Leary to Brian Boroimhe."

PARIS IN 1856.

From the N. Y. Daily Times.

The accounts from Paris are truly disastrous. The true state of things there, studiously withheld by Napoleon from the knowlegde of the French people, reveals itself in the private letters which we receive, and which, under the garb of commercial communications, fortunately foil the Argus eyes of the French Post Office. The state of things revealed there reminds us forcibly of the days of Louis XVI. Put a plebeian Emperor in the place of the old legitimate King, and the aristocracy of wealth in place of the aristocracy of blood, a Spanish noblewoman in place of an Austrian princess, the stern, unbending mind of Louis Napoleon in place of the soft, wavering, pliable heart of Louis Capet, and all the other features of both epochs—fraud in the higher, disgust in the middle, and want in the lower classes, blindness in the ruler, inanity in the clergy, impotence on the press, levity in literature, scandal in the theatres, debauchery in morals, cynicism in ethics, and depravity in society—all will, with some slight modifications, be found to be the same.

Again the cry for bread makes the inmates of the Tuileries shudder and tremble. Corn merchants, who speculated for a rise in flour, have again to look out for their necks. House-owners, who speculated on a rise in rents, have again to look out for their lives. Eugenie, lovely as Marie Antoinette, a bright, tearful, tender thing, gives precisely as she did, her jewels to the poor. But alas! the Mirabeaus and Lafayettes are no longer there to resist the rabble. Those feeble types of Mirabeau which the France of this day possesses, have given umbrage to the sulky Louis, and no reconciling element now stands between him and the people. But all this is not apparent on the surface. The surface of Paris is as gay and smooth as ever. Guizot, Thiers, De Tocqueville, are buried in the past. Auguste Comte writes tracts for the Twenty-ninth Century. The hotels are full of English and Americans. Rothschild is as witty as ever. Rachel has gone to Egypt to hurl her imprecations at Ristori from the foot of the Pyramids. La diablesse, toujours classique! But Jules Janin still remains at his post, and has entered into partnership with Beauvallet, the truthful and brilliant historian of the Rachel troupe. The lady at the Buffet of the Cafe Veron wears still the same fascinating smile, and the French gentleman of the old regime still sips his bouillon at the Cafe de la Bourse with the same classic grace. Madame Fould's soirees are brilliantly attended. Fould has a foible for horses and military men. Broken down English Derbymen, and officers of the army and navy, with a fair sprinkling of Fould's relatives, and a charming bevy of agents de change and speculators in haute famine make up the bulk of the circle. Dark-eyed Jewesses—the hair dressed a la Eugenie—whisper forth with oriental voluptuousness the latest fluctuations in the rents, and the Algerine officer of engineers, who stands by, ogles them with African intensity, twists his sunburnt moustache, and exclaims—"En voila des coquines!" A sinister but aristocratic-looking individual glides about the salon, exchanges a furtive glance with Fould, and bows to Madame in an abrupt manner. This is Emile Girardin, Emile of the Presse. Since Madame died he assumes melancholy. But what is this stir and general whisper and titter? Little Oppenheim is taken with a violent pain in his bowels. Fould seems uneasy. The English Derbymen raise their glasses. General sensation. All seem lost in dismay. The creator of all this trouble is a dark, terrible-looking, yellow-faced man, evidently a Portuguese, and a Jew; the former clerk and present rival of the Rothschilds. It is Pereira! Pereira of the Credit Mobilier. The swindler of former years was—at least in look—a gentleman. But this Pereira carries around him the foul perfume of the Ghetto. Notice his crapulous smile as he hands a bouquet to Madame Fould. Now he expostulates with Girardin. "Well matched!" exclaims a shrill little voice, a little hunchback's voice, Wolfgang Emden by name; a modern Æsop, the wit of the party—a regular farceur, a kind of buffoon to Fould, who playfully pulls the little fellow's ears, whenever he has had a crack digestion and money matters look bright.

And now watch Pereira! That gentlemanly looking man he is speaking to is Baron d'Argout, the governor of the bank.

This is a true picture of Paris society in 1856. The Paris Wall street has it all its own way, gives its tone to the ladies, dances the Cancan, and crowds the theatres. Vive la Banque! Vive Pereira!

Just round the Cafe Veron, taking the third turning left from the rue Richelieu, a little rue—rue d'Amboise—leads on its right to a still smaller street—rue du Petit Temple—which in its turn leads to a narrow lane, or rather cul de sac, where a cafe called the Cafe a la Croix d'Or, also presents a fair gathering of the usual French cafe-house stamp. But the singular feature of this is that many who enter do not remain in the rez de chaussee, nor do they take to the staircase to the right, that leads to the billiard room, but to a staircase to the left, where they are never seen to return to the cafe, but disappear nobody knows how. At the top of the staircase, a little old man asks for a ticket. This ticket, after having been found to be correct by the old man, gives admission to a small corridor, at the end of which the ticket-holder is led by a boy into a room where about seventy men are assembled.

On the walls are portraits of Robespierre, Marat, and Danton, while the figure of Jesus Christ stands upon a desk, in the shape of a crucifix. Behind the desk stands a man of about 28—thin, pale, and with sunken eyes, and rather bilious look. He holds a paper in his hand, and reads the names of six or seven hundred persons, simply stating their occupation and place of residence. Bankers, brokers, rentiers, flour-dealers, importers, embracing men of almost all professions, but chiefly commercial men. As he reads, each man writes it down. Not a word is spoken besides. Only when he is done, he says, "C'est le tour de numero dix-sept." Monsieur Numero Dix-Sept steps to the desk, and goes through a similar operation as his predecessor, and reads a list of some five hundred persons, while every one present as before, takes the names down. But not a word is spoken. Besides the reading out of the names and the calling out of the tours of the different numbers, not a word is spoken. All disappear as silently as they came. This is one of the Marianne societies.

In the meanwhile the bulk of the Parisians, the honest bourgeoise, the virtuous middle classes, have all gone to sleep or to concoct a future stock of honest bourgeoise! Va, Gaillard! There is also a small class of people who live to themselves, sporting with fancy, lovers of art and literature—intellectual, artistic people. They alone sleep in normal health—they cultivate their own mind and heart, and taste, and take no part in the affairs of Paris. They have little cliques; but never go to parties. French transcendentalists? Elegant intellectualists! Peace be with them. Bonne nuit. But higher above them hangs the moneyed crowd—there is dissipation, recklessness, orgies during the night, and frauds during the day, and from low, low down, comes up coldly and shrilly the cry for bread, bread—and God, what a cursing and gnashing of teeth!

But though the night is in its centre, still are the Boulevards as gay as ever. Women still haunt the streets. The cafes are still full. From Madame Fould's salon comes still the sound of music. Pereira stands flirting with one of the dark daughters of Zion! Jolly is Pereira. At the hotel of the Minister of Police mouchards run in and out. In the Cafe de la Croix d'Or there is still a flickering of light; the little withered old man still stands at the top of the staircase—silent men still pass in, and the reading of names is still going on, and Louis Napoleon is still thinking and smoking. Heavens, what thought and wha smoke!

Morning comes again, and Paris looks as bright and gay as ever. The provinces strive to emulate the fascinating cheerfulness of the Parisians. Lyons, Bordeaux, Marseilles, Strasbourg, Metz, Lillie, Orleans, Rouen, Havre, have their brilliant cafes and charming dames of the pave. Their Rue Lafittes and Foulds, and Pereiras on a small scale—fraud of course at the top, and starvation at the bottom of the social ladder, and disgust and insanity and drudging honesty in the middle classes, and "mariannes" and priests to say amen! But what heeds it? On the surface, all looks smooth and sunny. Bread and house-rents, however, grow dearer and dearer—the dark, starving masses of Paris and Lyons begin to howl. The police have not arms enough to clutch the malcontents. But who knows about those subterranean doings? The press is gaged, and small reports and bulletins of the Bourse are revised by Louis himself, and Pereira is a clever fellow. Vive Pereira! Vive la Bourse!

A LOOK AT LOUIS NAPOLEON.

From the Dublin Nation.

I was walking one evening along the Boulevards des Italien, with John Hogan, who had just come to Paris to have the superb statue of O'Connell, which he has designed for the city of Limerick, cast in bronze. We had been sitting amid the myriad group of loungers, whose cane-bottomed chairs clustered in front of the Cafe de Paris, watching the motley crowd that sallied by, in which you might mark every civilized and every uncivilized tribe of mankind, from the flame-eyed Algerian to the servile Ethiop; from the Russian Boyard to the everlasting Yankee—all donning a certain French varnish for the day, and all bearing it better than the race of Bull, whose name is Legion. The coffee with due encomiums had been daintily sipped, and we were wandering away with the stream, when to our stranger eyes became, visible therein an unusual stir. Groups gesticulated into clusters, the clusters cohered into a crowd, which bore away down a street to the left, and there took order. The shopkeepers were hanging out brilliant flags round the corner, and some, under the inspection of the police, loyal salutations in gas. So we ascertained that his Imperial Majesty, who had returned from Biarritz a few days before, and had been staying, to our great disappointment, at St. Cloud, had come into town suddenly, and was about going to the Opera. We took up our station accordingly opposite to the grand entrance, and waited as patiently as possible the hour, which it took for the police to prepare the way.

I suspect his Majesty is not habitually guilty of that reckless hardihood about his imperial person, which is ordinarily attributed to him. I know, the precautions which I could observe quietly, subtilly, and skilfully taken on this particular occasion, seemed to me to insure him against dagger or bullet far more effectually than if he had been cased in triple mail. The French Police have the eyes of Argus, and the hands of Briareus—or to speak not so classically, and more correctly, it is still inspired by the genius of Fouche. As the crowd consolidated along the approaches to the Theatre, the disposition of the Sergens de Ville were gradually made. As you moved, one after another keen eyed constable surveyed your face with scrupulous scrutiny, and when you become stationary you stayed there as if you were locked in a parade, conscious of a surveillance, which penetrated the whole mass like electric light. The vivacity of the Parisian mob evaporated, grimace and gesture grew far less piquant and buoyant under the subtle stern eyes of those Familiars of the new Bastille of Mazas. You should gradually suspect, too, that in blouses, albeit worn quite a la Faubourg St. Antoine, and broadcloth cut after the last British fashion, at your very elbow stood the genuine Mouchard. While we were talking freely of the Imperial regime, I remember we were struck by the too furtive and attentive professional look of a neighbor, who could not conceal his discomfiture when we turned our tongues to a gibberish mixture of Italian and Irish.

When the police had made their precautionary surveys and soundings, the process of guarding began. A battalion of the Zouaves—still the pets of Paris—trotted down, lithe, sinewy and fierce as tigers—broke into pickets and occupied all the accesses of the place. There was something savage in the contrast of these wild Mamelukes on foot—the turban on their shaved heads, kirtled in scarlet, gaitered in yellow, and armed to the teeth—with the over oppressive civilization of the rest of the scene. They looked as if an emeute would have been perfect pleasure to them—and, doubtless, it would be. But they were hardly standing at such ease as is possible for their untamed nature, when, with steady stately step, a company of the Foot Guards dropped in sentinels along the street. Midway thereupon an occasional dragoon vidette sat like a statue on his horse. Old Police Officers continually peered through all these elaborate arrangements, and obviously considered them, as they were, perfect. An officer now and then galloped down to see if all was right, and galloped back to report accordingly. Five or six Cent Gardes in an undress uniform of green and gold, and red, which is handsomer than the full dress of any rank in the British service, then rode down, and looked about them, and saw that all was safe, and so vanished at the back of the Theatre.

In a few minutes more, you could hear far off that full voiced murmur, not overwhelmingly loud, or oppressively enthusiastic, with which the French cheer—and with a clatter of arms and a crash of hoofs, the cortege rolled down from the Boulevard. First came the Court Piqueur, in an Irish-looking Napoleonic livery of green, flourishing his long whip, and magnificently mounted. After him charged a troop of Guides, cocked pistol in hand—a cavalry as agile, as awful as the Spahis. They were followed by a squad of Chasseurs of the Guard; and then, before the Emperor's carriage, rode the Cent Gardes. I could but see a rush of silver cuirasses, gold helmets, and varnished jack-boots, close behind which pressed a close carriage simply appointed. There was a slight check in the speed of the cavalcade as he passed the place where we stood. Thus I could see his face for a minute, as he bowed forward—slightly, not ungracefully acknowledging the salutations on all sides, apparently as mild a mannered man as ever cut a throat or struck a coup d'etat. The face is exactly the face that one sees in the shop windows and on the coins. It has apparently improved in expression with the man's prosperity—it certainly does not wear the feline look with which he used to be portrayed even by flattering artists. The mean lines of poverty and the rigid wrinkles of the prison have, we suppose, faded. He is not in very bad health. I could observe that the cheek looked bronzed and healthy, as though Biarritz had dashed new blood into that fragile frame. And that was all. Of the Empress, I could only see a graceful head with ambrosial locks gently bending. The crowd of courtiers hurried on, and the rear guard of dragoons.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1856

EVACUATION DAY.

Where are the artists? Where the writers of romance, the painters, the dramatists, the epic poets? Why have we so many glowing volumes about the Nile, Omoo and Typee, and other scenes to which distance lends enchantment? Why comes it that the career of the First Napoleon lures the scholarship and talent which should be employed in the illustration of lives, labors, and victories identified with the fortunes of the Republic? Why should the genius of America—artistic and antiquarian—leave unheeded the episodes which intersperse the Iliad of the Revolutionary War? New-York, in possession of the British troops, furnishes heaps of material for the picture-gallery, the library, the theatre. Bocaccio, Tasso, Dumas, Vernet have not worked on themes of more thrilling interest than those suggested by the gossip, traditions and chronicles of that epoch.

The Middle Dutch Church in Nassau street—gutted of its pews—for many weeks the gaunt prison-house of 3,000 Americans—with the Dead Cart rumbling up to it every morning, to carry off from six to eight victims who had perished in the night; the desolate burials of the prisoners on the mount—an old redoubt—at the corner of Grace and Lumber streets; Cunningham, the truculent Commissary of the prison, torturing the prisoners or poisoning them with arsenic; Lord Rawdon's troopers prowling through the city after night-fall, breaking into houses, and robbing everything they could lay their hands upon; the gaol-hulks rotting in the stagnant pool at Wallabout, with their freights of human flesh breeding the deadliest disease and pestilence; the Mall, running along the front of the grounds where Trinity church now stands, crowded with the gay and fashionable loyalists of the day, promenading to the music of one of the English or Hessian regiments; Governor Clinton's old Dutch mansion in Pearl street, with its important front of six dormer windows, and gardens extending through Water street, which then overlooked the river; the old City Hall, at the head of Broad street fronting Wall, with its whipping-post and pillory, and its gallery leading out over the main door-way from the Senate chamber, where George Washington, in a suit of dark silk velvet, steel-hilted small-sword by his side, black silk hose and shoes with silver buckles, made his sworn pledge to Chancellor Livingston, "on a superb quarto bible," as the author of the Annals of Philadelphia tells us; and a thousand other scenes, personages, and events, invite the studious, the patriotic, and the nobly gifted.

But, above all, there is the crowning incident of the Revolution—the Evacuation of New York — the day when General Washington, at the head of a detachment of his victorious army, escorted by a company of Westchester light-horse, entered the Bowery from Harlem, whilst the baffled enemy, under Sir Guy Carleton, dropped into their boats at the Battery, and, before they reached the Narrows, saw their dishonored flag torn down, and the Stars and Stripes flying in its stead—a vision of glory in the Heavens, announcing the consecration of the New World to an eternity of freedom.

On this earth, among nations, an anniversary more joyous does not recur. Year after year—glowing with memories of patriotism, eloquence, wisdom and heroism—it dawns over this prosperous city, and shows us what a world of wealth, industry, happiness and busy intellect, has grown up over the ruins of English dominion in this country. Justly and right creditably does General Sandford parade the First Division on that day. Justly, right creditably, and most usefully does he signalize by that brilliant and impressive array of citizen-soldiers, the extirpation of the enemy, under whose rule America would have to this day remained a handful of crippled colonies—an abused appendage of a covetous and plundering Empire.

Throughout the State, officially it should be, as in the hearts of the people it truly is, Thanksgiving Day.

THE END OF THE ENGLISH AND FRENCH ALLIANCE.

After centuries of hostility between England and France—centuries of war, conquest, and mutual reprisals—a hollow truce was formed between those ancient rivals. The guns of Waterloo were yet booming in the ears of France, when a royal pageant—an imperial farce—was witnessed in the Chapel of the Invalides. The Queen of England, in presence of her imperial cousin, was bending over the tomb of Napoleon, doing homage to the remains of the chained eagle of St. Helena, and the "august ally" looked on with an eye of grim delight. There were triumphal entries into London—a gathering of Lords and Commons and civic dignitaries, and a feeble attempt to muster the decimated ranks of the Guards into a military salute. Louis Napoleon is in the House of Brunswick. The press of England is loud in the praise of the Queen's imperial guest. His sagacity and foresight, prudence and firmness, were the themes of every pen—his praise was hymned by every Briton's tongue, and the happy alliance, so unexpectedly consummated, was pronounced eternal. The arbiters of empire and the promoters of civilization were to dictate not only to the monarchs of the East, but they even proclaimed their intention of setting limits to the republican ambition of the West. Charged with the importance of their mission, and dazzled with the glitter of its presumed results, the alliance did not perceive the dark chasm already opening at its feet. At first it was a slight fissure—it is now broad, black, and bottomless, sufficient to swallow up all royal friendly relations in the old world. The smoke had hardly rolled away from the battlements of the captured Malakoff, and the last soldier of England's shattered attack had scarcely been gathered into the trenches from under the guns of the inviolate Redan, when jealousy and dissension became manifest in the ranks of both armies. The one conquered, the other was defeated; and the feeling of dissatisfaction, thus engendered in the latter, imperceptibly spread among the officers and commanders. It finally reached the statesmen of both countries, and was felt by the great mass of the people. The ink was still wet on the Treaty of Paris, when this dissatisfaction became audible throughout England. Although silent in the court, it murmured through the press, and found a bolder expression in the voice of the multitude. England felt humiliated and her prestige completely destroyed. Peace had been proclaimed before England was allowed to redeem her character in the presence of Europe. The sapless laurels gathered by her fleet at Bomarsund, and the shameful repulse before the Redan, had not been redeemed by one wreath of victory. The glory was all to France, the dishonor and defeat belonged to England. Her schemes had been frustrated, and her policy checkmated. She desired the destruction of the Russian fleet, and a naval position in the Black Sea. During the whole of the w , England maintained her diplomatic influence at Constantin ple. Her ambassador was perfectly acquainted with all the intrigues of the Divan. He was a favorite with the Sultan, and although imperious to his attaches—reckless of the lives of the British soldiers; although he allowed the garrison of Kars to be starved into capitulation, and became obnoxious to charges of the gravest import, still he was sustained at his post, that the diplomatic influence of England might prevail in the East. But affairs have at length arrived at a point beyond which they cannot proceed without involving Europe in a general war. The hollowness of the alliance is at length revealed, and the whole press of Paris daily assails the duplicity of England. The Constitutionel, the Emperor's official organ, is outspoken in its condemnation of the course which England is now pursuing. The Gazette de France charges her with their financial embarrassment, and the disturbed state of Europe to-day. The Assemblee Nationale accuses Lord Palmerston of "turbulence," and the statesmen of Austria of "tergiversation," and asserts that "the idea of England was to obtain possession of the Black Sea, and establish herself there on the ruins of the Russian navy." Austria, in occupying the Principalities, and England in keeping a fleet in the Black Sea, are accused of a conspiracy against the integrity of Turkey, when it was supposed her independence had been established. The Union is equally severe on England, and states that France now differs with her on all the questions at present in dispute regarding the treaty of Paris.

Thus ends the unholy alliance between La belle France and Perfide Albion. Russia and France on the one side, Austria and England on the other, with the minor monarchies cowering under their toppling thrones and Prussia neutral, will probably complete the programme of the next European royal struggle. We say royal struggle, because the people will not take sides with either. Ambition and despotism, avarice and duplicity, are now opening a path to freedom from the besotted courts of the East. The next hostile shot fired by the august allies will be at once a signal and a knell—a knell for the decayed monarchies that have so long revelled upon the industry of their trampled subjects—a signal to the brave young spirits who are to lead the liberated hosts from bondage, and plant a new flag upon every historic battle-field and king-crowned capital in Europe.

THE NICARAGUAN CONTROVERSY.

A most important and interesting correspondence, exposing some state-secrets of the Nicaraguan Government has been given to the public. The correspondence embraces,

1. Letters of a private nature, which passed between the President of the Republic of Nicaragua and one of his military officials, General Domingo de Goicouria.

2. A statement from Major John P. Heiss, refuting the ideas, ignoring the plans, and questioning the honesty of the purposes of the latter.

3. A note from Mr. Edmund Randolph, accusing the same Nicaraguan official of "dishonest and treacherous intent."

4. A lengthy communication to the N. Y. Herald, signed "Lo Mismo," purporting to give "Walker's true position in Nicaragua," the article being in fact an echo of the Costa Rican circular issued some four months ago, ostensibly by seven men of General Walker's army, and afterwards (see I. News, Sept. 27) exposed by Mr. W. T. Johnson, for himself and comrades, as a "tissue of falsehoods," to which his name was appended without his consent.

5. A brief note to the Herald, from Louis R. Lattimer, Lieutenant First Rifles, N. A., stigmatizing "Lo Mismo" as "a liar and a coward," who "dare not acknowledge his name."

Such are the sources of much public comment, and not a little excitement in political and "filibustering" circles.

Enthusiastic sympathizers with the cause of Nicaragua may regret the publication of those documents, thinking it injudicious at this period to make the defection or personal pique of any of President Walker's staff a subject of public controversy. Yet, upon a rigid and fearless reviewal of the disclosures made, and of the reasons which led to their publication, there are few, we think, who will not regard the whole case as ultimately beneficial to the cause of which General Walker has been and is the sole brain and recognized head; a fact, let us here remark, apparently not sufficiently understood by his late Brigadier-General Goicuria.

Of President Walker, it is needless to speak. His name is in the archives of the heroic. It is the historic property of the world. The exaggerated abuse of his enemies—recounting the marvellous individuality of the man, who, with a muteness almost mysterious, inspires confidence—not less than his brilliant successes, has handed his name and deeds to the historians and romancists of the future.

Of General Goicuria it is needful to remark, that he is a gentleman of many estimable qualities, a Cuban exile who has sacrificed much for the love of his native land, and whose position among the patriots of his country was rendered the more distinct and respectable from the fact that to the possession of wealth and spirit, he added mental talents of no ordinary character, and an energy sufficient to guarantee a prominence to his other qualifications.

That he feels himself aggrieved, we have no doubt. From his view of the uses of Nicaraguan glory and independence, we are even willing to believe that he might think himself honorably justified in pursuing a course which could be excused on no other ground than that of a supreme allegiance to the fortunes of Cuba, and the reckless use of all means in furtherance thereof. But we are forced to see the points at issue by a different light. It is not as a Cuban revolutionist, but as an officer of the Nicaraguan army, and an official of the State, that we must regard General Goicuria. Viewing him as such, the issue he has had the temerity to draw with his chief, becomes of very easy access.

Discipline is life itself to Nicaragua in her present struggle. A rigid and persistent adhesion to those forms which are half the strength of a military power, engaged in consolidating a democracy and giving it a prestige which inspires its defenders and deters its enemies, must be observed and enforced, else the elements of success become a scattered mass of irresponsibility—a mad variety of strength without system, and headlong wildness without rein.

General Goicuria outraged this vital principle of strength and duty: first, by meddling in negotiations without having any powers from his Executive, and second, by not promptly obeying the instructions of his Chief, in not going to negotiate where his instructions directed. These assumptions of individual responsibility, certainly were sufficient to guarantee the instant erasure of his name from the official list of Nicaragua, especially as he was not within reach of a formal impeachment and court martial.

Instead of going to England according to his commission, General Goicuria delayed in New-York, and as Major Heiss shows, was intent on raising and sending, ostensibly to Central America, a force of some eleven hundred men, after writing distinctly to the President of Nicaragua that he could not now in any way whatever continue in connection with him.

"Even if this movement," says Major Heiss, "was intended with the best motives, I was satisfied that an independent expedition to Honduras, or any of the other Central American States, would not meet with the approbation of General Walker. It would immediately array the hostility of the United States and Great Britain against Nicaragua, and they would, no doubt, take decided steps to prevent it, as well as to prevent any further emigration to Nicaragua."

Major Heiss states, that notwithstanding General Goicuria's representation "to some few friends" of Nicaragua, "that his purpose was to advance the cause of General Walker," he (Heiss) believed it was the reverse. Major Heiss may have reason to suppose so; for us, we would rather infer that the armament was intended by some means for the Cuban cause, to the postponement of which, General Goicuria it would seem, was impatiently adverse. He avows that Cuba was his first love, and that he entered the Nicaraguan service to make it a stepping-stone to the attainment of that nationality, in whose defence he had won his spurs. This was natural and praiseworthy, but even taking the matter on these, his own grounds, he did not keep faith with General Walker, there existing between them a compact, the first clause of which runs thus:—"General Walker pledged his word of honor that he will assist and co-operate with his person and his various resources, such as men and others in the cause of Cuba, and in favor of her liberty, after having consolidated the peace and the government of Nicaragua."

This treaty, or compact, has been published by General Goicuria, and is, we take it, authentic. According to this stipulation, General Walker was not in a position to aid Cuba, or devote himself to that purpose yet, and General Goicuria, who held a commission under General Walker, had no moral or official right to further any project save that in which his General was engaged. He broke his terms of the compact.

Thus is General Goicuria in the wrong on either side. A reader of his letters of advice to President Walker would be more likely to imagine the writer a joint occupier of the presidential chair than an official, subject to its guidance and countenance; and his many pressing, and almost petulant allusions to the sale of the transit right, would give grounds of suspicion that he was interested in the success of those capitalists, who are known to be unreserved enemies of President Walker's supremacy in Central America. In connection with this point of the controversy one important fact has been made public, which shows that, "while Vanderbilt was claiming the protection of this Government, he was, at the same time, very desirous of making terms to Nicaragua, offering large sums of money to have the privileges of the old Transit Company restored to him." Major Heiss wisely recommends this very important point to the careful attention of Secretary Marcy.

General Goicuria states that he adhered to the cause as long as he considered General Walker a man of "honor, and faith, and ordinary sagacity." As to the honor and faith we cannot see that General Walker has in this matter forfeited either. If Goicuria ever held him to be a man of sagacity, he must so hold him now, for General Walker's course has never wavered. His policy to-day is the same as it was when he landed with his fifty-six men. This very fact—the calm consisteney of his onward march—has created a favorable opinion where his "filibustering" was denounced.

In conclusion, it is beyond argument that an over-sensitiveness of General Goicuria led him to publish those papers, which are more of a charge against, than a defence of him. On the whole, General Walker rises to a more stable and dignified position from this controversy.

Since the foregoing was in type, Major Heiss has published a second letter, the chief point of which is a reply to Mr. Vanderbilt's correction of the statement made in Major Heiss's first communication, and was reiterated with increased emphasis—thus,—

"I am not apt to misunderstand a man's meaning, and not having any peculiar interest whatever in the Old or New Transit Company, I cannot be charged with an intention to do Commodore Vanderbilt injustice. I will, therefore, repeat, that in May or June last, he stated to me, that he had an agent in Nicaragua, and that General Goicouria was that agent.

"I am perfectly willing that my name shall go before the country on a question of veracity with Commodore Vanderbilt's.

"JOHN P. HEISS."

The clouds are quickly disappearing. The Red Star is in the ascendant. It is a Fixed Star.

ENGLAND—NEW AND OLD.

The sectional party arrogating the distinctive title of "American" accuses the Irish of ignorance, political and international. It is said, that two generations must pass away before the Celt can comprehend the genius of Americanism. The knowledge of liberty is an abstruse subject—an occult science—to be learned only in the dark caverns of Know-Nothing American mysteries. We must enter with bandaged eyes and be born again in an "American" lodge, that our souls may be illuminated. We must drink the hell-broth of Puritanical bigotry, that our hearts may throb in fraternity.

In all humility we confess that the policy, as well as the Spirit-rappings of New England, are beyond our grasp. We cannot understand how citizens so peculiarly "American," and so desperately "Republican," are yet the only section on this continent—not even excepting Canada—who keep up an obtrusive sympathy with Old England—the den of aristocratic pirates.

The realm of Arnolds and Blue Lights, is still as English as the Hartford Convention could desire. New England society is the propaganda of Old Englandism. That is—limitation of the franchise, a standing army, a State church, and a plutocracy.

The Hon. Mr. Geo. Marsh, of Burlington, Vermont, delivered the introductory lecture before the New England Society. His subject was—England—New and Old. It was one of those efforts to preserve a lively affection for the Mother country. So far we sympathize. The mother country is our birth-place, and we rejoice to see "real Americans" more lively than ourselves in filial gratitude. But the sympathy between England—New and Old—may be carried to extremes; and it will amount to virtual treason if based on political alliance. It may be our ignorance, but we maintain that none but a New Englander would attempt to represent the sham constitution of Old England as glorious, and the people of Old England as free.

Mr. Marsh said—

England—New and Old—occupy the same position in two hemispheres. Each is the focus of freedom, each the aspiration of oppressed humanity in their respective continents. I speak not of their governments. Englishmen, though ever vigilant to protect their own liberties, are apathetic towards what does not touch themselves.

And again:

The American and English nations and governments are feared and hated by other powers, for they know that liberty is the basis of their systems. Therefore, tyrannical potentates endeavor to fan dislike and jealousy between them—first favoring one and then the other; and by a thousand arts of intrigue strive to raise discord between them, so as to eventually crush out freedom. We are not called upon to give physical aid to assist any to work out their liberty. Every country, every oppressed nationality, has the power to work out its own freedom, if it wish to be free; and the twenty-five millions of Italy may at this very moment be striking the blow which shall set them loose from their oppressors. But when the dread period shall arrive, if ever, when the fire on the altar of liberty is quenched, upon England, New and Old, rests the responsibility of its extinguishment.

In other words, liberty depends upon the intimate friendship of New and Old England, against the Southern States, the Papistical Irish, and the rest of mankind.

So we, ignorant Irish, are informed that England, New and Old, are the friends of Liberty, hated by the tyrants who endeavored to sow discord between them. "Each is the focus of Freedom—each the aspiration of oppressed humanity in their respective Continents." But yet, this profound politician tells us that "they are apathetic towards what does not touch themselves;" and "We are not called upon to give physical aid to assist any in working out their liberty." That is to say—if our ignorance can penetrate it—we need not aid Central American Republicanism against British aggression, nor pay for Negro Emancipation. Our duty is fulfilled if we incite the Negro to cut his master's throat. New-England, with breeches-pockets buttoned and at a safe distance, is "the aspiration of oppressed humanity." The slave-drivers of Old England, having stolen and used the Negroes, persuaded the old ladies to buy out the property. New England will not repeat the humbug.

But to return to our international sympathies. Old England on her part, is "laboring in the vineyard of the Lord." While her monstrous pirate fleet is kept in perfect discipline, New England is graciously informed that Her Majesty's sacred person will be conveyed for adoration to Canada. Let emigration of the Irish to Canada be encouraged, and Royal visits inaugurated!

The London News, Oct. 22d, says:

"Her Majesty will, it is said, at no very distant day pay a visit in person, accompanied by some of her family, to this, the greatest and most populous of her transmarine possessions. The Queen could do no more useful or patriotic act; and richly does Canada merit the compliment of a royal visit. It has outlived all the calumnies of its Tory detractors, and has demonstrated that Colonial self-government is far more compatible with and provocative of loyalty, than the rule of a family compact, or government from Downing street. Canada, we cannot doubt, whether it continue its present connection with England—and there is now no reason why it should not—or resolve itself into an independent monarchy, is destined to have large influence over North America. In either contingency, nothing is more desirable than that the influence of English civilization should continue to prevail in Canada, and through Canada diffuse itself more generally over that Continent; and a visit from Queen Victoria, surrounded by her family, would do more to promote that influence, and secure all its blessings, than any step that could be suggested. Why, then, should it not at some early and convenient time be taken? That, indeed, would be a visit worth recording."

English civilization is to diffuse itself from Canada over this benighted and democratized continent! This is certainly laughable, but the power of England is not to be laughed at. We have just escaped from the danger of having her nominee for President of the Republic. The first-class British organ quoted above, says that Buchanan is a filibuster, and that he will endeavor to extend the Republic, and drive forth English protection and freedom.

But they say:

"Under the presidency of Mr. Fremont we may expect a policy which will, on the contrary, diminish the exterior complications of the United States, by giving greater attention to domestic affairs."

Our ignorance cannot comprehend this, unless it mean that Fremont, Stowe & Co., would keep the country in such a civil war of excitement about Negroes, that British policy might progress unnoticed and unmolested, in Cuba, Panama, and South America.

New England plays the game of Old England. The black Ace of Spades is always trump. Puritan banditti enter convents, burn churches, and tar and feather priests. Cuba, Mexico, Central America, and the whole South are disgusted with Northern Republicanism. England in the mean time weaves her her web of alliances.

The English rejoice now over the prospect of a confederacy of South American States to serve as a check upon the North, and build "a stable foundation for the balance of power in the New World."

Our readers will not be surprised to learn that the Republic of Chili has in Congress proposed a confederacy of Southern States against the Republic of North America. We see no objection to this, if the Southern Republics acted for themselves alone, against Northern aggression. But Walker is not the emmisary of aggressors. He is the defender of American liberty against the plots and the fleets of European despots on this continent.

From the tone of the British press, it is easy to discern the origin of the Chilian manifesto against this country.

General Walker, personally, may be a selfish or a righteous man. Let his people see to it. But we believe that the citizens of this Republic do well to keep an armed watch in presence of the bribery, the intrigue, and the robber-fleet of England, in the Gulf of Mexico. The English aristocracy are a genteel gang of pirates; their whole history is a sanguinary record of piracy and filibustering. We sincerely trust that our Government will never follow the example of the Mother Country, by invading the rights of free and peaceable neighbors. But, notwithstanding the sympathy of New England, we shall not fail to keep our eyes upon the diplomacy and brute-force of Old England.

We offer our opinions in all humility, not having matriculated in the Know-Nothing Lodges of Vermont. Our Irish ignorance must be excused.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Charity Fair at the Crystal Palace, closed last Saturday, with the most opulent success. Upwards of $30,000 have been realized. The Hospital, to the erection of which this munificent sum has been devoted, will be one of the noblest institutions of the city, notwithstanding the misrepresentation of the bigots of the Express, who state that Protestants are to be excluded from it. The sick of all creeds are to be admitted.

John Mitchel has left Knoxville on a lecturing tour. He has already appeared in Nashville and St. Louis. From which place he descends the Mississippi, calling at Memphis, Natchez, and Baton Rouge, on his way to New-Orleans. He will most probably be with us about Christmas. His lectures have met with a brilliant success. We heartily congratulate him.

John Martin is at present sojourning at Pan, Basses Pyrenees, in France. He is in excellent health. For the present, his visit to America has been deferred.

Izod O'Dogherty has returned to Ireland with his youthful, beautiful and gifted wife—Eva of the Nation—and is practising at the Medical profession, of which he is a highly accomplished member.

Smith O'Brien remains at Chairmoyle. His letter to the Secretary of the dinner given in Dundalk, the other day, to Tristram Kennedy, one of the Members for the county Louth, is a gallant reiteration of the principles and convictions which compelled him to take up arms against the English garrison in Ireland. In the course of a few weeks, we are happy to inform our readers, the columns of the Irish News will be enriched with contributions from the pen of our noble-hearted, noble-minded friend.

Catherine Hayes—our glorious country-woman—has made her first appearance in London, after her brilliant and prosperous voyage round the world. Her reception was enthusiastic, and her success most splendid. Her voice has immeasurably improved in volume, intensity of expression, and all the higher attributes. Limerick may well be proud of her, and all Ireland should feel grateful for the fresh flowers of fame this glorious girl has won for the lyric wreath of the old Land of Song.

MISS TERESA ESMONDE

Will, we are sincerely glad to announce, favor her numerous admirers in this and the adjoining cities, with a selection of Readings from the Irish and American Poets, previous to an extended tour through the Eastern States.

On Monday evening, December the 8th, we hope to meet, at the Stuyvesant Institute, a full attendance of our readers enjoying a pleasant and instructive entertainment, such as this gifted young lady never fails to render, and for which she deserves the most generous support.

ATTACK UPON THE IRISH SERVANT-GIRLS.

Lieutenant-Governor Raymond—Editor of the New-York Daily Times—has made a mean and cowardly attack upon our poor, hard-working and virtuous country-women in America. Mean, for it is neither high-minded nor gentlemanly, nor even decent in an Editor—especially a Lieutenant-Governor—to obtrude the mysteries of his kitchen or his garret upon the public. It is cowardly, for many of those poor, but noble girls, have no protectors, and Lieutenant-Governor Raymond—Editor of the New-York Daily Times—insists upon the irresponsibility of the Press. In all the domestic virtues, in every trait and feeling which make a household honorable and happy, in morality, industry, honesty, and delicacy of sentiment, those maligned Irish servant girls, will compare favorably with the most pretentious models of excellence whose society his Vice-Excelleney cultivates.

A BRITISH LIE.

A late number of the London Times charges the Editor of this paper with having expressed a desire to become a Slavehold er. The anonymous bully lies. The only slaves Mr. Meagher would wish to have, are the kind his ancestors several hundred years ago possessed—light-haired, blue-eyed Saxon Slaves.

A Word About Ourselves.

Mr. Meagher lectures in Tremont Temple, Boston, Tuesday, December 2nd, and before the Young Men's Democratic Club of this city, in the Academy of Music, Tuesday, December the 9th. Royalty and Republicanism is the subject he has chosen for both occasions.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

EIGHT HOURS IN HAVANA.

Nothing lies between us and the yellow walls of the Moro, unless the calm purple sea, which here and there throws in on coral reef, and rock, and broad patch of sparkling sand, the white fleeces it had borne from the storm. Nothing lies between us and the fair white city of Havana, with her crown of palm-leaves, and marble fountains, and shadowy gardens, where the perfume of fruits and flowers never dies, unless this same calm purple sea. The sun lights up those yellow walls, and shows us clearly—grinning out from many a grim nook and crevice—the huge guns behind which the flag of Isabella flies defiant. High above these grinning guns, rises the tall light-house, and at the base of this light-house springs out a wooden platform with a balustrade. The sun, too, lights up the brown arches and the dusky belfry-towers of the Cathedral, where Columbus sleeps; lights up the white faces, and the green balconies, and the rainbow-painted basements of the houses springing up behind the staunch sea-wall; which, too, is mounted with grim guns and dotted with silent, slow-pacing sentries. And here, close on our right, with the spray and fresh sea-breeze playing in upon the grated windows, and waking in many a poor soul delirious thoughts of freedom, stands the great prison built by Tacon, in front of which Narcisso Lopez died.

The paddles are in motion. The Stars and Stripes run up, and we head directly for the harbor, lying in close to the Moro. Through the smoke of our furnaces, we see groups of soldiers, in gray uniform, here and there along the walls. Some one comes out at the edge of the platform at the foot of the light-house, and hails us from a height of two hundred feet. Captain Windle stands prepared,—trumpet under his left arm. The paddles slacken. There's a gush of steam. The passengers open their eyes all over the Moro, and look as though they expected thunder. The voice from the edge of the platform—two hundred feet above us—roars out something in a strange tongue. Captain Windle answers him through the trumpet—

"Empire City!—New Orleans!"

The voice once more roars out. Then all is still—the platform vacant. The paddles resume their work with their wonted speed. The Captain comes down from the hurricane deck, hangs up his trumpet, and passing round to the Purser's room, pleasantly wishes us all good morning. The passengers breathe again. They take to making curious searches along the shore, and some of them joke as heartily as if they were on the Mississippi.

There's a gouty German, in gold-rimmed spectacles, on board, whose peculiarities quite fascinate the crowd. He speaks the Anglo-Saxon tongue with a surprising fluency, but appears to have paid particular attention to the choice phrases, with which such popular celebrities as Mr. Sam Weller, Mr. Montague Tigg, and the renowned Dick Swiveller have familiarized the public. He comes from Coblentz—is fat and lame. Evidently is not in the best of health, but, nevertheless, possesses an active appetite. His thirst is mighty, too. In quenching it, his resources are exhaustless. Sherry now. Champagne by-and-bye. Pale ale directly. Port on the top of that. Brown stout before he turns into bed. It is not of the Moro; nor the Palacio de Gobierno; nor the Grand Teatro de Tacon; nor the crowded shipping in the noble basin through which we glide; nor these rude gondolas that swarm about us with their swarthy oarsmen; nor the rolling of the drums along the staunch sea-wall; nor the ringing music of the bugles from the parade-grounds behind those solemn bastions overhead; nor the stately spars and graceful mouldings of those war-ships, with the Red Cross drooping from the peak, and the red-coat of the English marine glittering above the bulwark; nor of that lovely island, whose fruits and flowers, whose orange trees and royal palms come down to the water's edge to greet him, and whose treasures are untold. Not of these, nor any of them, does our companion from the Rhine this moment think. His thoughts are centered in the cook. Or if they wander for a moment, it is to haunt the breakfast-table—on which the breakfast is not yet laid—and in the dreariest mist and melancholy, hover round the pantry. For a while, fare-thee-well, Pale Student of the Rhine! We've come to anchor.

A large boat with a white canopy, swept by eight oars, bears down upon us. The Spanish flag, dangling from a flag-staff in one corner of the stern-sheets, dips and splashes in the sparkling water. The men at the oars, wear white cotton shirts turned up with blue, and straw hats having a broad black band. It is the Port Officer's barge. The Purser is at the head of the starboard gangway, with the necessary papers, ready to receive the gentleman. The Captain stands a little in the back ground, and the occupiers of the state-rooms, in a motley crescent form behind him again.

The barge shoots up. The oars are lifted. A gentleman in bright blue dress-coat and brass buttons, white trowsers, white waistcoat, black silk hat, weak eyes and delicately colored spectacles, red and white silk stockings, and the daintiest patent-leather pumps, trips up the steps. The Purser moves down to meet him. They salute, shake hands, move off together to the Purser's room. The door closes. To the uninitiated, the rest is all a mystery.

Two gentlemen have followed the gentleman in the delicately-colored spectacles and patent-leather pumps. One is tall, and advanced in years—very brown—tough-looking—solemn—spare. The other, fairer, younger, stouter, less solemn, and more flexible. Both dressed in white, like the waiters at a table d'hote. They keep their hats on, however, and the hats display on the left side, a patch of red cloth, with a small brass button inserted in it, bearing the initial of the Spanish Queen. These gentlemen are supposed to take possession of the ship. They light their cigarettes, and commence their melancholy march up and down the deck.

In the meanwhile, other boats have crowded round us. Two of them from the English men-of-war. In half-dress uniform, there sit in the stern-sheets of those handsome boats, young officers of Queen Victoria—eager for the news—eager for the last paper—eager to hear what tidings have sped to them from the Crimea. On the larboard bow, a flat-boat, piled with oranges, and green pine-apples, bananas, and cocoa-nuts, has been made fast. The Pale Student from the Rhine spies the precious freight and hastens to it. An aged Creole, in ragged garments, guards the green and golden treasure. The German hails him in curious English. No result. The German tries a French salute. It is a blank discharge. The German appeals to him in the deep gutterals of Coblentz. The Creole is impassive, and heeds him not.

The Pale Student then makes faces, quotes from Mark Tapley and Sam Weller, grumbles for breakfast, and limps back disgusted to the quarter-deck.

The other passengers have been busy looking down the gangway, prying into all the boats, taking and comparing notes meanwhile. They have been particularly busy with the Port-officers' barge, and have been endeavoring to make out who that silver-embroidered sleeve, lying out a little beyond the awning, belongs to. Some think the Captain-General. Another fancies the Archbishop. A New-Yorker swears it must be the Chief of Police.

All conjectures end where they begin. Nothing positive is discovered. Nothing can be seen but the embroidered sleeve. Whoever owns it remain buried in the white hood astern. The mysterious gentleman in the Purser's room, however, emerges into light, and bowing with the airiest elasticity, slides to the gangway, and down the gangway, hopping through the oarsmen, into the stern of the barge. The barge slips off. Then the English officers have their turn. And then the agent of the company. And then the friend of some officer on board.

The gong beats. "That's good!" exclaims the Student of the Rhine.

After breakfast, the Purser tells us we may go ashore. Down the gangway, then into a small boat, across the harbor to the Muelle del Luce—the only wharf at which passengers from the New Orleans steamer are permitted to land. Here you climb up into something like a ferry-house, and are directed by a man, with a long white coat, red epaulettes, musket and bayonet, to a little office; in which, seated on a tall stool, we find our friend with the delicately-colored spectacles, and the dainty patent-leather pumps. Another official stands beside the stool. They make out permits. We pay a dollar for each permit—exchange salutes—light segars—produce our permits at the gate, and then break loose through town.

The town is full of soldiers. Every five yards, we strike against a blue check blouse, blue check trowsers, gaiters of the same, panama hat with red patch and brass button, waist belt of black leather. The gentleman thus harnessed for the field, carries a clean musket. The musket carries a bayonet.

Through divers narrow streets; through lines of sluggish mules, burdened with baskets and kegs, bundles of vegetables, and other produce; through countless volantes, some stationary, some beginning to move, others pulling up, others flying nimbly over the hard white pavement; past stores of various kinds, some poor, some rich, some very dusty, others very clean and gaudy; under linen awnings, painted like summer clouds or garden backgrounds in the theatres, and stretched on slight iron bars across the thoroughfare, from house to house; through all such and many such passages, and scenes, and sights, and wonders; and then we pull off our hats, and breathe and cool ourselves beside the fountain of Ferdinand, fanned by the majestic palm-leaves of the Plaza das Armas.

Fronting us, we have the palace of the Captain General, and on our right, barracks for the infantry. The whole place swarms with soldiers. Most of them in the blue check blouse. Here and there a blue coat, with red facings and gold epaulettes. We drive out beyond the walls—soldiers every foot of the way! We go into Le Grand's or Dominica's to have a cup of coffee or a petite verre—soldiers all round! We call upon a tailor—he's cutting out a blue check blouse, and twenty tailors are hard at work, with goose and sleeve-board, shears and needle, upon blue check blouses, all about him! We look into the shoemaker's—he's at work on belts and buckles! The harness-maker? He's over head and ears in pistol-holsters, cartridge-boxes, shoulder-straps and pouches! Every man, every lad we meet, has the panama hat, with the brass button and red patch stitched upon the side. Havana is in arms! Havana is in state of siege! The troops of the line have been distributed throughout the island. The city is garrisoned by volunteers.

Towards noon, a curious regiment enters the beautiful spacious Square, which lies outside the walls, close to the Fountain of the Indian in the Paseo de Isabel.

An artillery regiment—the guns, four pounders, mounted on mules—the muzzles overlooking the tails—the breech or but being planted between the shoulders of the animal. The officers are mounted on small, stout-built, sprightly horses, and wear the sombrero with the red sash, and gold epaulettes. The privates, besides the cavalry sword with its steel scabbard, carry a carbine slung by a belt of yellow polished leather across their shoulders. Various evolutions are performed—all by the sound of the trumpet. Quitman, beware! The martial mules of Spain prick their long ears and switch their braided tails, and point their mountain-pieces at you! The back-bone of the mule shall in these days eclipse the wonders done in Sampson's time, by the jaw-bone of a kindred beast!

We dine at Dominica's. The floors are marble. The tables marble. The fountain in the centre, marble. All marble. We dine upon an omelette—drink a bottle of light burgundy—light a cigar, and with serenity digest the temperate meal. This done, we purchase another cigar, and through multitudes of soldiers drums and trumpets, betake ourselves to the Cathedral, there to look upon the spot where the immortal son of Genoa the Superb, lies dumb and deaf amid the turmoil and the glory of the world his dauntless spirit called to light.

One side of the Cathedral, as we mount the steps in front of it, stands a row of little buildings. Very old, dusty, crumbling buildings. Warehouses, one would think, for old clothes, rusty nails, mouldy boots and shoes. Fit for nothing else. A door in the end of these buildings—the end nearest to us—swings upon its hinges. We enter. It is a very small, dark, discolored room. Old books, with parchment covers, upon the floor—the floor laid down with red tiles and broken earthenware. A round table in the centre. Old books upon that, too; Spanish newspapers; a bundle of old pens; five or six ragged cigars; a dirty inkstand; and behind them all, an ill-shaved priest, in a torn gown, and an enormous black hat of pasteboard, and a pair of broken shoes, with stupendous silver buckles in them.

The holy man looks up with startled modesty as we enter. We beg pardon in imperfect French, being wholly ignorant of the Spanish tongue. We give him to understand that it is the tomb of Christopher Columbus we desire to see. We offer him a cigar.

The holy man calls an idle youth from another room of the ruined building, and motions us to depart. We bow to the kind old gentleman, bid him farewell in French, and throwing away our cigars, follow the youthful guide into the temple where the wondrous sailor sleeps. The boy shows us a plain white slab. A likeness of Columbus is loosely sculptured on it, and at the foot of the humble tablet we read the inscription—

O Restos, e ymagen del grand Colon!
Mil siglos durad guardados en ea orna
Yen ea remembranza de nuestra a Nacion.

And such is the monument which man has consecrated to the discoverer of a world greater than the old. But from the beginning, there has been, and to the end, there shall be for him a nobler monument—one built for him when the seas went down, and over the beautiful face of the creation the stars sung through the eternal vaults their first hymn of joy.

WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS ON SOUTH CAROLINA IN THE REVOLUTION.

William Gilmore Simms delivered a most interesting and useful discourse on the 18th inst., before the "Young Men's Lecture Association." The subject was one thoroughly congenial to the nature and intellectual resources of Mr. Simms, who, as a delineator of Southern patriotism, heroism, customs and manners during the revolutionary era, stands unrivalled. In the various novel and romances, founded on, and illustrative of the history of that period, which have made the name of Gilmore Simms a leading one in American literature, we may behold the loving care bestowed on the memories which itis the privilege of the historian to chronicle and the poet to enshrine in the loftiest numbers. In these historical romances we may behold the almost religious zeal with which Mr. Simms has collected the hitherto unpublished heroic incidents—the domestic reminiscences of Southern firesides—the stirring scenes of Southern camps—the local glory, so to speak, of the Time and Place, which alike reflect pride on each other. This is not the place to enter on an analysis of the characteristics of Mr. Simms' various works; but it cannot be out of place to state that besides being probably the most voluminous American author, he is the one, par excellence, who has devoted himself to the illustration by history, novel, poem and essay, of Southern glory, mind and manners. His lecture, consequently, on "South Carolina in the Revolution," could not be otherwise than attractive; and if the lecture-room was not as full as it might be, we are inclined to think it was owing to a want of due publicity, regarding Mr. Simms' presence and purpose amongst us. For ourselves, the first we learned concerning the lecture was the report of it in the daily papers, the morning after its delivery; and with the aid of which (especially the Daily Times,) we give an outline of the distinguished gentleman's discourse, and beg to draw the attention of our Know-Nothing friends to Mr. Simms' notice of the Irish colonists of the Revolutionary days.

For eighty years, the lecturer said, the people of South Carolina had reposed in the faith that their mind, morals and manhood were of a merit to establish for them a perfect claim to the respect of all good men; that they had given not a few of the greatest men in the country to her struggles for liberty and individual renown; that nothing could take away or diminish the glories of their past, whatever might be thought of her performances in the present. But their history, it would seem, must undergo revision. The old chronicles—the grateful traditions of three quarters of a century—were pronounced to be mad delusions—and there were those who proclaimed that the ancestors of whom they were so proud to boast, were, in fact, false to their duty and to their country, recreant to their trust, heedless of their honor, faithless to their brethren, traitors in the cabinet and cowards in the field.

These were the allegations poured forth with a malignant sort of satisfaction, seemingly with no other purpose than to goad and mortify the pride and sensibilities of a hated party. Whether true or not in substance, the assault was gratuitous and wanton, and grossly subversive of all social propriety. Was it true?

The pith and marrow of Mr. Simms' lecture was devoted to a reply to this question. How was it (he asked) that South Carolina was identified with so many hard-fought fields—so many heroic names—and so many bright pages in the history of the Revolution? Were Marion, Sumpter, Moultrie, Gadsen, Rutledge, Laurens and Pickens, mere make-weights in a struggle to which they could afford neither soul or intellect? If so, his tory was an invention, and the Revolution was not. He was not going to review the miserable politics of the day, but he sought to prevent an outrage on national history. He sought to vindicate the generals and statesmen, the patriots and warriors, in whose career the whole nation were interested. The blow he sought to avert was made at the dead and the living—at the past, the present and the future, robbing the one of laurels made sacred, consecrated forever by their tears and blood, the other of all those monuments by which the future generations were to be taught becoming lessons and examples. To tear away from the hearts of men their living faith in the virtues of their sires, was to destroy the very hopes of a people along with all their honest pride and more prolific impulse—it was to deprive them of all the noble stimulants which goad a people to great performances. What then must be the morals of a party which could strive for such an object?—what the desperate necessities of that party which could justify a policy so profane and barbarous? South Carolina asked no favor. She demanded justice. She required that while we exposed her faults, we did not suppress her virtues.

It was alleged that the public services of South Carolina during the Revolution were greatly disproportioned to her strength and ability. In 1776 the population of South Carolina was 300,000. This population was scattered over a forest country, covering more than 30,000 square miles. South Carolina furnished 35,000 soldiers to the war. Massachusetts had a population of 352,000, and her contribution to the war was 88,000 men. We were not to suppose that these were individual soldiers sent from either State to the war; the enlistments being for a short period, often three or six months, the same men, their time being expired, were re-enlisted. The population of Massachusetts was all comprised within an area of ten thousand square miles. They could be easily brought together. That of South Carolina, rating but three persons to the square mile, could be assembled with only great delay and difficulty. The people of Masachussetts were homogeneous, and from a single stock; that of South Carolina was made up from all European nations, and almost half of her people were born British subjects, a large portion of whom had been less than ten years in the country. They were, accordingly, so many foreign enemies in her heart. The settlements in South Carolina in '76 lay chiefly along the great watercourses of the country. The colonists had planted at first along the seaboard, and had only begun to penetrate the mountain region. Some of the first settlers were purely Irish, others purely Scotch, others Germans, others French Huguenot. A wide waste of swamp and forest lay between these settlements. The French and Irish settlers readily subscribed to the Revolutionary movement; but with the Scotch, since '45, their instincts were all loyal. Even Flora MacDonald, romantic rebel as she was in Scotland, became, with her whole family, as warmly devoted to the British in North Carolina as she had formerly been to the Pretender. The Germans, too, were mostly with the crown. These were the facts, and for these he offered no apology. Nor needed he to apologize for that people. The day had gone by when the loyalists of America were properly subjects of reproach. They were faithful to their old traditions, faithful to the laws, faithful to their instincts. We had accordingly no quarrel with them now, but with these facts before us, and a thousand other such, which time did not suffer him to state, was it not a wonder that South Carolina should take part in the Revolution at all, particularly as she had no such cause of complaint as threw the Eastern Colonies in rebellion? Hardly one of the acts of oppression which prompted New England into resistance prevailed in South Carolina. She was then, as now, a purely agricultural country; she did not employ machinery; she was not a competitor with British manufactures. She lost no vessel by forfeiture. The King's arrow on her forest trees, in the boundlessness of her wide domain, abridged no man's liberty. Would it have been wonderful, then, if there had been many who could see no good cause for the conflict? Wonderful if all of British birth should ally themselves with the royal rather than the Republican cause? He would tell them who did so, and who did not. The Scottish settlements everywhere, a large proportion of the Germans, the great majority of the English, and most of the Quakers, espoused the cause of the crown. What remained to the Republicans? The entire agricultural population, the entire mechanics, the entire lawyers and professional men mostly, and the Irish colonists, with few exceptions—these were the parties who, in South Carolina, asserting abstract principles rather than present necessity, raised the banner of revolt in sympathy with Massachusetts—when she was stricken by the foe. By looking at her history we would see that no colony of this Confederacy ever showed itself so prompt—very few half so prompt to share the troubles of Massachusetts. But in that day—yes, in that day—Massachusetts could send as a special ambassador to Carolina one of her chief men, Quincy, imploring sympathy and succor. And he obtained it. Yet even then there was one far-seeing Carolina planter who said to him:—"I foresee that we shall only exchange one tyrant for another: the tyranny of New-England for that of Old-England; and I confess, for one, I prefer to submit to the usurpations of the one rather than the other." How prophetic was that man's language, let the present hour declare! In spite of all the odds against them, the patriots of South Carolina threw themselves into the breach amongst the first in behalf of Massachusetts. And he (Mr. Simms) contended that purer patriots never were found. He denied that any one had a right to inquire into their mere numbers when called upon to recount her achievements; and when those achievements neutralized her deficiency of numbers, they enhanced the glory of each several deed. Through bloody civil war to which no other State was subjected, contending against odds the most unequal, against an enemy within and an enemy without, almost entirely deserted by her sister States, never receiving any assistance whatever from the New-England States, and, finally, with the very moderate succor furnished by the State south of her, coming out triumphantly, though bleeding at every pore—this was the true issue in the briefest possible compass. The number of her loyalists, so far from disparaging her claims, rendered them brighter and more glorious. Her fame was greater in degree with the numbers who were thus within her own bowels laboring for her destruction. Her merit consisted in being able, while contending with a home faction, to make contributions of wisdom, strength, patriotism and valor to the common cause, which no other State in the Union had rendered, though placed in circumstances a thousand times more favorable.

Mr. Simms adverted to the measures adopted at an early period by South Carolina, towards forming a Continental Union, as a proof of the sincerity of her republican sentiment, recounted the part taken by Carolina in the revolutionary war. If, he said, in conclusion, the future was to witness a contest between ourselves, and this great Empire was to be subjected to the horrors of a civil war, let the issues be unmixed. If South Carolina be now imbecile as to the past, there needed no argument to prove the fact. It would prove itself in action. No State gained anything by showing that South Carolina was faithless as a friend and worthless as a foe. Let her establish the fact in either case, and what followed? Was the argument meant to make her submit quietly without a struggle—submit that she might escape from blows and bondage? Ah, what real power confident in itself ever descended to such a miserable artifice? Better, braver, nobler they should oppress her with the mailed hand and the biting weapon.

THE CONVALESCENT.

[In Ireland, there is now a perfect calm—peace is over all her fields. Her case required, and it has received, a severe treatment—but she is cured.—Cor. of a London paper.]

The dear Old Land, they say, is cured—
Released from every pain—
No wildness in her calm blue eye,
No fever in her brain:
'Tis true, the spectral hue of death
Still pales her beauteous cheek,
But the wild throb from her heart is gone,
And her pulse beats low and weak.

And her Saxon doctors loudly boast
Of their cunning and their skill,
In curing the Old Land for aye,
With their famous Famine Pill.

Ah, well she may, the poor Old Land,
In calm despair bow down—
The best blood from her veins is gone,
Her buoyant vigor flown.
Purged of a million stalwart sons,
Whose bones strew every plain—
A million more, the wide world o'er,
Wand'rers beyond the main.

Oh, truly they boast how well they knew
The treatment of the case—
How quickly their Starvation Pill
Blanched her rebellious face.

They may give o'er their doctoring now,
And turn elsewhere their skill—
They'll bleed her as they always did,
But she will not need their Pill.
For low she lies, the Poor Old Land,
And may, for bitter years—
Till the Tyrant's doom, from the venging womb
Of Time, shall dry her tears.

Till then let Saxon doctors boast
Of their cunning and their skill,
And exult o'er the myriad victims
Of their famous Famine Pill.

Oh no, ye gentle doctors all,
Fear not for your patient now,
'Twill be long ere the red rebellious blood
Shall again suffuse her brow:
She needs no more starvation now,
A gentler course remains—
Slow leeching will keep down the blood
In her dry and shrunken veins.

Then e'er let her Saxon doctors boast
Of their cunning and their skill,
And how quick they cured the dear Old Land
With their famous Famine Pill.

New-York. J. Q. W.

The announcement of the London Publishers for the forthcoming season, include some works by old favorites, and some by older notorieties. Among them are a volume of poems by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, a new serial by Thackeray, novels by Mrs. Trollope, Mrs. Gore, Shirley Brooks, and others, a Life of Falstaff, by Robert Brough, illustrated by Cruikshank, a Christmas Book by Richard Doyle, in which the quaint and comically eloquent pencil of the artist will follow the fortunes and misfortunes of "Brown, Jones and Robinson in the Highlands;" a fresh book of travels by Mansfield Parkyns, etc.

A new translation of Beranger's Songs of the Empire, the Peace, and the Restoration, has appeared in London from the pen of Robert Brough. The book is very favorably received by the critics; the specimen extracts we have seen exhibit great ease, heartiness, and musical spirit. In a favorable article in the Illustrated Times, the writer sums up the qualifications of a translator of Beranger thus:—

"We cannot give unqualified recommendation to this delightful little volume, because to do so would be to assume, as a fact, that Mr. Robert Braugh is—not a Frenchman, to the manor of that ilk born and bred—at least one of those Anglo-Frenchmen, or Franco-Englishmen, about whom the Chevalier Bunsen has written so learnedly, and of whom Anthony Hamilton, in the first instance, and H. Evremond, in the second, were types. For the perfect translator of Beranger should, we opine, to the lexicographic lore of Mr. Spiers, the polyglott attainments and critical accumen of M. Philaréte Chasles, and the metrical facility of the late Dr. Maginn, unite a mind thoroughly saturated with French politics, French literature, and that peculiarly French code of moral philosophy, of which the joyous Roger Bontemps was the Aristotle, and the immortal King of Yvetot, the Epicurus. The faultless Beranger translator should be, in fine, a person capable of editing Punch and the Charivari at the same time, and writing simultaneously the "Chants du Caveau" and the "Homeric Ballads."

"The American Poulterer's Companion" is a very handsomely printed and profusely illustrated volume, devoted to a specialty, the importance of which is duly chronicled herein. Mr. C. N. Bement, (the author,) is well known by his devotion to the culture and improvement of poultry. The first edition of this work, published some eleven years ago, was the pioneer of all works on the subject. The volume now before us, in its minute and extensive perfection, contains a Practical Treatise on the breeding, rearing, and general management of various species of domestic poultry, with one hundred and twenty portraits of fowls, chiefly taken from the life, by Mr. Van Zandt, of Albany, with views and plans of coops, nests, feeding-hoppers, &c. Well may we say, with Shakspeare—

"So fair and fowl a book we have not seen."

It is published by the Harpers.

A Child's History of Rome. By John Bonner, author of "A Childs' History of the United States." 2 vols. Harper and Brothers.

Mr. Bonner has here given us two precious little volumes, which will be hailed not less by the author's professional brethren as a fresh instance of that writer's mental industry, than by the up-growing generation as something to make study attractive, and thereby really beneficial. The familiarity of the style does not at all detract from the classic dignity of the subject; and in its sustained equanimity, clear, conversational and copious, is, we take it, a triumph of which Mr. Bonner may be proud. It is a most difficult task to fitly accomplish such a work as the present—a history, which being interesting to, because thoroughly within the comprehension of childhood, also possesses every needful point as a remembrancer for these of more advanced years. We heartily recommend it.

The Musical Bouquet and Institute Choir, is a collection of songs, duets, trios and choruses, collected and arranged by Wm. B. Bradbury and Charles C. Converse. We have a great and pleasant variety, from several eminent composers, with some dainty contributions from unknown but promising music-writers. We perceive that Denis Florence M'Carthy's bounding lyric, commencing—

"Ah! my heart is weary, waiting, Waiting for the May,"

is printed in this collection, as in several others, without mention of the author's name. John P. Knight's world-famous "Beautiful Venice," is arranged as a duet by Wm. Dressler, but no mention is made of the orginal composer. The editors would do well to render honor where honor is due. It is just that we mention these omissions, with the exception of which, the work is well worthy of our good wishes. (Ivison & Phinney.)

Littell has skimmed the cream of the cream in his choice for the Living Age of this week. Each selection is a prize article, and when all are so good it is difficult to point out the best. It contains the Shingle Movement, from Household Words, and an interesting account of the pious bravery of Mother Angelique, the Abbess of Port Royal. Shakspere and his Native Country, from Fraser's Magazine, and a favorable criticism of Mrs. Stowe's Dred, from the Examiner. The Living Age always contains a scientific paper. The Physiognomy of the Human Form from the Quarterly Review, is a valuable resumé of some late German and French works.

"Hewet's Illuminated Household Stories for Little Folks" promises to be an exceedingly welcome addition to the libraries which our publishers are getting up for the young folk. Hewet's series is chiefly addressed to the younger branches of the domestic circle, and embraces the dear old stories which have delighted generations, elegantly printed, and illustrated in a highly creditable manner. The designs are by W. H. Thwaites, and engraved by Loomis, and other artists of exceeding taste and ability. A particular feature is the frontispiece to each volume, which is printed in oil colors.

CORK SCHOOL OF ART—DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

The Committee of the Cork School of Art, says the Cork Examiner, having determined to avail themselves of the annual examination as a fitting occasion at once to vindicate the proficiency of the pupils, and to afford to the citizens of Cork an intellectual treat, resolved to have the prizes awarded publicly, distributed in the Athenæum, and, at the same time, to hold in that building an exhibition of such treasures of art and vertu as the city and the surrounding neighborhood could afford. Accordingly, on Friday night, the 29th ult., the house presented a gay and animated appearance.

The chair was taken by the Mayor, who, in a few appropriate words, opened the business of the meeting.

Alderman Scott then briefly ran through the history of the Cork School of Design, from the period of its first foundation up to the present time. He reported that, after an interval when it had been closed up by direction of the Department of Art, it had re-opened, and there were now attending the school from 180 to 200 pupils; who, under the direction of the Committee, and with the able assistance of Mr. Raimback, the head master, had obtained so many medals as to leave Cork second to no city in Ireland. In addition to that, there were in the national schools of the city 450 pupils under Mr. Shiels, a gentleman giving great satisfaction to the Committee, and working out the operations of the school with great ability.

Medals were awarded to the following students: Thomas Petty, 1 medal; John Morrogh, 1 do; Henry O'Shea, 1 do; John S. Morgan, 3 do; Jane White, 2 do; Alice Wright, 1 do; William Patterson, 1 do; Elizabeth Max, 1 do; Augustine O'Leary, 1 do; Jane Morgan, 1 do.

Certificates of honorable distinction were also awarded to the following students:

Local Prizes.—Michael O'Leary, design for medal; Henry O'Shea, ditto; Fanny Harrington, design for lace: Jane Morgan, 2nd ditto.

Local Examinations.—Wm. H. Hill, mechanical drawing; Wm. Patterson, 1st perspective; Wm. Hill, 2nd perspective; Henry O'Shea, 3d perspective. Wm. Patterson, laws of color—five times up for reward.

London Prizes for Examinations.—Wm. H. Hall, perspective; Edward Martin, do; Wm. Patterson, do; Abraham Cross, geometry; Sarah Fullwood, do; T. Harlowe, do; Mary Long, do. Augustine O'Leary, model drawing; Micheal O'Leary, do.

Mayor's Scholarship.—Senior Scholar, H. O'Shea; Junior Scholar, John Morrogh.

The name "California" is already found in the history of the conquest of Mexico by Berial Diaz, a companion of Corles. But there it is only applied to a bay. By and by it was given to the whole country north of that bay. Its origin is uncertain. Some learned men started the opinion that it ought to be derived from the Latin "Calida fornax," (a hot oven,) and that it was given to the peninsula because the first discoverers suffered there much from the heat. Some other derivations of the name California from the Latin may be found in Clavigero's history of Mexico. Clavigero makes the remark that Cortes was very fond of such Latin words. Probably it is a misunderstood or corrupted Indian name. Because it was for a long time supposed that it was a large Island, and that many small islands belonging to st, some called the country "Las Californias," (the Californias). One hundred and thirty-six years after Cortes, about the middle of the seventeenth century, some geographers called these supposed Californian islands "Islas Californas," (King Charles Islands,) in honor of Charles II, King of Spain, who intended to conquer the whole. What we now call "Upper California," was called by the geographers of the sixteenth century "Quivira."

The origin of the word "Canard" when employed to signify some unfounded story, is not generally known. The following are the terms in which M. Quetelet relates in the "Annuaire de l'Academie" (article on Norbert Cornelissen), the manner in which the word became used in its new sense: — "To give a sly hit at the ridiculous pieces of intelligence which the journals were in the habit of publishing every morning, Cornelissen stated that an nteresting experiment had just been made, calculated to prove e extraordinary voracity of ducks. Twenty of these animals ad been placed together, and one of them having been killed nd cut up into the smallest pieces, feathers and all, and thrown o the other nineteen, was most gluttonously gobbled up in an xceedingly brief space of time. Another was then taken from the nineteen, and being chopped small like its predecessor, was served up to the eighteen, and at once devoured like the other, and so on to the last, who thus was placed in the position of having eaten his nineteen companions in a wonderfully short time. All this, most pleasantly narrated, obtained a success which the writer was far from anticipating, for the story ran the round of all the journals of Europe. It then became almost forgotten for about a score of years, when it came back from America with amplifications which it did not boast of at the commencement, and with a regular certificate of the autopsy of the body of the surviving annimal, whose œsophagus was declared to have been found seriously injured. Every one laughed at the history of the 'canard' thus brought up again, but the word remained in its novel signification."—Galignani.

The Paris School of Medicine is greatly annoyed just now by a determination on the part of one of its gravest professors to make a debut at the opera as a tenor!

The whole literary production of Russia, in 1855, consisted of 1,200 works.

TALKING STATUES.

[No. 2.]

A NIGHT IN THE CORK EXHIBITION.

The reader who has visited the Exhibition will, it is hoped, understand the allusions in the following paper. For the information of others, it may be necessary to mention that the objects of art introduced, are the "Eve," and "Psyche" of M'Dowell; Foley's "Youth at a Stream;" Heffernan's "Susannah;" Hogan's "Drunken Faun;" Lawler's "Venus;" "The Lost One" (described as the youth bearing the drowned boy), by Thomas Farrell, of Dublin; and the "Hunter Reposing," and "Bard," by his brothers Joseph and James Farrell; the "Sleeping Child," by Christopher Mooney; the bust of Miss Catherine Hayes, by E. A. Foley; and the figure of Erin. This last, however, as described, is purely ideal, but legitimately brought in, as Hogan's figure of "Hibernia" occupied a position in the Fine Arts' Court, and suggested it. It may be as well to add that Erin is described as wearing a blue mantle—as blue, not green, is the heraldic color pertaining to Ireland now.—Dublin University Magazine.

"That occurred to me, too," replied Eve, at first; "but that Greek Hunter, near Psyche, is rather a modern young man, and is very well proportioned; and then the Youth at the Stream, just opposite where I stood, is remarkably handsome."

"Oh! is he not a beautiful creature?" said Venus, with animation. "He is nearly equal to Apollo."

"Or to Adam, when I first saw him," added Eve. "Poor Adam! I have seen nothing of him for an age. They hardly bring him into public places at all, and I generally have to remain without him in them."

I saw a kind of malicious smile upon the lips of Venus, and guessed it arose from some passing thought of Vulcan. She gave no expression to the thought, however, but said, playfully resuming the subject—

"The little children, too, are quite the same as formerly. You observed the Baby Asleep—Moore's—on the pillow nearly opposite to you."

"Indeed I did, a dear, pretty little creature it is. Besides, I studied the legs and arms of numerous babies in the Exhibition, which were visible enough; and I am sure they all are as they ought to be. But I am very uneasy, indeed, about my poor daughters. In fact, I saw several very pretty-faced creatures amongst them without body enough for an infant of a year old. A waist that one can put one's arm round is very well, but if one can put one's hand round it, it is neither useful nor ornamental."

"Oh, horrid!" exclaimed Venus, "I wouldn't suffer my waist to be diminished an inch in circumference for the world. But it all comes of wearing those vile clothes."

"They must, as I told you, wear some; but I cannot understand why they put on those tight things they do now. They might have loose, easy draperies, falling gracefully over their forms, and allowing every limb and muscle its free, natural play. It makes me melancholy to see the way in which they disfigure themselves now, in point of appearance, to say nothing of the sacrifice they must make of health and comfort. If I could have spoken to them I would, but I was unable. However, I hope the very fact of seeing me as they did, may teach them a practical lesson on the subject. But let us look at some of those things in the cases"

They moved up the steps, and I stole after them, to observe their proceedings. Venus did not appear to set much value on the articles of dress; but her companion evidently admired the laces and the crochet greatly. She put on a polka jacket of imitation point-lace, and asked the goddess if it was not becoming; but Venus fell into an immoderate fit of laughter, and protested that it looked quite ridiculous without something else. She then added a crochet robe, but the goddess still objected, insisting that it would not do to dress exclusively in lace and crochet. Other fabrics were then tried, and disposed in various fashions on the lovely form of Eve; and at length a rich blue tabinet, and a gorgeous crimson velvet, arranged in full flowing draperies, leaving one white shoulder and half a snowy bosom bare, and suffering a foot to appear, exposed to a little above the ancle, produced a costume that my eye decided to be positively beautiful, while even the fastidious Venus said that the wearer looked almost as handsome as if she wore no robe at all.

"Drink of this cup—you'll find there's a spell in
Its every drop 'gainst the ills of mortality;
Talk of the cordial that sparkled for Helen—
Her cup was a fiction, but this is reality."

"Reality!—As I'm a Faun, 'tis the real thing, 'and no mistake.' Horatius Flaccus, my old friend, why did not the gods permit you to taste Irish whiskey? What a jolly soul you would have been if you had imbibed it, instead of those resinous potations of Macænas, thick stringy abominations—Lyæus punish the compounder?—not like this transparent honest fluid in the glass barrel. There isn't a headache in a hogshead of it. Holla, there, you nymphs, gliding in there among the tin canisters! Holla, there, my jewel! where are you going to? By the powers of delf, you'll not get off without a kiss, for old acquaintance sake, swift as you are—here goes for a chase."

But a crash at the same moment plainly informed me that whoever or whatever might be the fair object of my friend the Faun's pursuit, had no need to fear being overtaken by that mirthful personage. Down he had evidently come, and the fall seemed to have entirely changed the tenor of his emotions, for the first words I caught after the disaster were—

"Æsculapius, assist me — what a tumble! May the fate of Actæon be mine if I ever again bother my head about one of you, you deluding hussies. Here are my bones aching, like the foot of Vulcan when he was kicked out of Olympus, and came sprawling on the isle of Lemnos, with a sprained ancle. And the 'blessed liquor' running waste in all directions. Thunder and turf! was ever such a disaster known—just as I had come across the divine fluid! May all nymphs, and naiads, and dryads have the luck of the fifty daughters of Danäus, and be condemned to the perpetual filling of bottomless tubs, as a punishment for that mischievous minx causing such a loss of the Milesian liquid. But grief is a dry article, and requires moistening; here's for a draught—hip, hip, hurrah! Bacchus be praised, isn't it great stuff!"

During this very uproarious interval I had left the northern hall, and stolen quietly into the eastern, where, stretched right across the passage by the whiskey manufacturers' contributions, the Faun, with his head leaning against one of the counter supports, was indulging in "potations bottle deep" of the "mountain dew," of which he seemed so much enamoured. He gradually began to subside somewhat in turbulence, and to give utterance to few sounds, save a very drunken and suppressed humming of verses, taken at random from various ancient and modern bacchanalian songs—Irish lyrics being predominant—and now and then a hiccup of marvellous intoxicated character. I felt no disposition to make his closer acquaintance; but anxious to know what being it was that he had seen amongst the tin-plate articles, and whose attempted pursuit had led to his disaster, I crept softly along by the southern passage, and entered the outer compartment, where the fair creature should be found. I looked around for a little while in vain, but at length I heard some one saying, in a very pleasing voice—

"Oh! I have it at last; this must be it surely, and it does seem quite equal to what I heard them all say of it. One could defy all the elders in Jerusalem to get a glimpse at one when those nice curtains are drawn. 'Tis a very elegant contrivance, indeed; I'll get into it."

"God bless me," said I to myself, "that's Susannah, positively, that is getting into the Eglinton bath—I had better cut. If I were caught here, I might be treated like those rascally old Rabbi. I'll take to my heels forthwith."

And, with a very reasonable degree of speed, I made my way back into the eastern hall again.

As I reached the entrance of the Fine Arts' Court, a hum of many voices in that direction convinced me that something unusually exciting was going on there. I hurried my steps thither, and observing much bustle and movement at the southern end of the hall, I ascended the steps at the entrance, in order to obtain a better view. The case of the stir was evidently some object on the right of the great organ, and looking anxiously in that way, I observed that a young and graceful female form was the centre of an animated group, who seemed urgent in their appeals to her to do something that she appeared timidly to decline. At length she yielded to the entreaties that were addressed to her, and, leaning on the arm of a young man, who bore an ancient Irish harp, advanced to the front of the organ, and made three profound inclinations, with an air of combined dignity and gentleness that was winning in the extreme. The anxious crowd around her drew back as she took up her position, and gazed on her with mingled admiration and attachment, together with that eager look which denotes the expectation of some refined and elevated enjoyment. Isolated as she now stood, I could observe her face and figure with distinctness. The former was one in every respect attractive—the features regular and handsome, the brow smooth and finely shaped, the lips full, yet delicately moulded, and the entire countenance lighted up by an expression of bright intelligence, varied at moments by a pensiveness which flung a passing shadow over the features the clouds and sunshine of an April sky. The head was symmetrical, and set finely on the bust; and the rich auburn hair, through whose waves gleamed here and there a golden thread of light, was admirably in keeping with the character and complexion of the fair owner. The figure, I have already said, was slight, graceful, and shrinking, and was robed in a simple dress of white, of modern fashion. I could not doubt who stood before me—it was Catherine Hayes herself.

As I gazed, the young minstrel who had led her forward touched his harp. The symphony resounded grandly through the silent hall. The figure of the songstress seemed to dilate as she listened to her native "Gra machree," and at the first chord of the accompaniment, her voice gushed into melody to these words—

Wake, mother, wake; a deathlike trance
Has bound thy soul too long!
That soul that sped the warrior's lance,
That roused the minstrel's song.
Loved Erin, hear thy daughter's voice—
Upraise thy drooping head,
And let the wond'ring world rejoice
To find thou art not dead.

* * * * * *

Mute as marble stood the listeners, throughout that glorious and impassioned burst of song—mute as they who, at the voice of Nourmahal, when she breathed her enchanting melody—

"Stood hushed and wondering,
And turned and looked into the air,
As if they thought to see the wing
Of Israfil, the angel, there."

Nor did the sounds of vulgar plaudits desecrate the air through which it was wafted as its echoes died away. It sank into the spirit's utmost depths, unmingled with aught that could weaken its influence. A divine essence, it was absorbed into the soul, and thrilled through it, in silent yet all-pervading music.

How long? A moment, possibly, but it might have been an age. I had no consciousness of time—no consciousness, perhaps, of anything. My thought had been, as it were, a voiceless remedy. I knew no more.

Yet I must have been conscious of something more—conscious that, beside the figure of that fair being, now kneeling, with uplifted head, there stood another female form, whose air of maternal dignity contrasted finely with the delicate frame of her young companion. Yet, matron as she seemed, she, too, was of proportions which had almost the delicacy of maidenhood—

"Her form was light,
And her eye was bright,
But a tear stood trembling there;
And her wan cheek showed
That the bygone night
Had been one of sorrow and care."

There was, however, despite that fragility of appearance, a queenly majesty in her aspect, and a pride in her bearing, that told she had known what it was to rule; and, though uncrowned, she wore a regal mantle. On its blue folds were broidered a rose, a thistle, and a shamrock, with the motto, "Tria juncta in uno;" while another royal robe of richest green was beside her, and lying on it an ancient crown and sceptre. A noble dog crouched at her feet—a dog such as we only see in the pictures of a by gone time Those present gazed upon the group with wonder, in which a reverential awe seemed mingled; and I felt my soul so subdued by the majestic mien of that statelier form, that I sank on my knees, involuntarily, as I gazed.

"Sweet daughter," said the queenly female, in tones slightly tremulous, yet solemn and full of melody, "thy voice is no unworthy one to awaken me; nor is this scene one which my eyes can dwell upon with other feelings than those of pride and hope. Here, amid the genius of my children, I behold that which announces to me a future that, if no dark destiny interpose, may outshine those glories of the past, that so long have been the dream of my sorrowing slumber. Here, where the illustrious dead, to whom I have given birth, are reanimated by the art of the illustrious living—my children, too—and where the imagination groups together, what vulgar reality keeps sundered from each other;—here, where sculpture and painting summon before me the poets, the orators, the statesmen, the warriors, whom in other days I nursed, whom I nurse to-day;—here, where the thoughts that I have inspired stand embodied, beautiful and enduring, beyond even my human children;—here, where all is mine, and pays me homage, I feel yet a queen. What I see here all owns me as its sovereign, and I see here what conquers the conquerors of sovereigns—Time and Death. Mute lips are here, whose eloquence shall yet speak through ages, whose songs shall be clothed with imperishability. But to thee my words are unnecessary. I shall not further pursue the theme. I have wakened, fair daughter, at thy call. The spell that thralled my senses is removed. My reign will have new glories from this hour. Behold the dawn!"

At the instant a golden haze gathered over the scene, in which the figures before and around me seemed to melt like those of a dissolving view. A numbness crept upon my frame, and my limbs felt weak, beneath the burthen of the body. I sank from my kneeling posture to the ground. Languid, and overcome by a strange and unaccountable sensation, I stretched at full length along the floor. I saw nothing; but I heard the voice of Faun, first distant, and then nearer and more near. Quite close to me, it was the most drunken voice I ever listened to. It was expressing a rollicking determination on the owner's part to go home in his own clothes. I had a ludicrous, but very distressing, conviction that he had none. He staggered almost over me. I was utterly miserable, but could not stir one inch. He passed; his voice grew a little fainter, but made me very wretched, by an intimation that he would not go home until morning—in fact, "till daylight did appear." I thought he might stagger back again, consequently; but he didn't. His music died away. "Mine, immortally mine," said another voice, in a low whisper, at my side. Psyche was again before my eyes. How divinely beautiful! Was the sunlight brighter on those golden tresses? Was the pure tint of that lovely brow more pure? Was it a dream?

The saffron hues of early dawn streamed into the Fine Arts' Court. All was in profound repose. Eve stood revealed in her womanly loveliness. Psyche sat motionless, with the butterfly at her feet. The Faun was lying, in his position of lamentable discomfort, as stiff as gypsum could make him. Susannah was modestly seated, as if trying to hide herself from observation, with nothing. Venus looked nearly as modest, with a similar difficulty as to clothing. But 'tis useless to proceed. Busts and everything were arranged in their places, just as usual. Where was I?

At that precise moment I opened my eyes, and looked curiously round my bed-room. My blinds were not down—I never keep them so. My shutters were open—they always are. There was, melancholy to relate, no one there to whom I could tell all that happend. Accordingly, I turned round and fell into a doze; then I awoke, shaved, dressed, breakfasted on fried ham and eggs—a very capital dish at breakfast—and wrote the whole out for my friend Poplar. If he publishes it, he has to blame himself.

Address of the Catholic Library Association.

To the Catholics of New-York:

The New-York Catholic Library Association cannot more briefly indicate the objects which prompted its formation, than they are expressed in the language of the Constitution, which is as follows, viz.:

1st. The dissemination of Catholic and useful knowledge. 2d. To forward the moral and intellectual advancement of its members. 3d. To create among its members a spirit of harmony and good feeling, that will be conducive alike to their interests and pleasures. These to be attained by establishing a Library and Reading Room, and by Readings and Lectures when practicable.

In bringing our Association into public notice, we believe that there is very little argument or persuasion needed to convince the Catholic community of the advantages to be derived from the establishment of such an institution.

The members of this Association are Active, Associate, and Honorary. To the active members, who must be Catholics, and each over eighteen years of age, and who must be proposed one month before election, are entrusted the care and management of the Association. For this class of members the initiation fee is one dollar, and monthly dues twenty cents in advance. Any person may enjoy the privileges of the Library and Reading Room, as an Associate Member, on paying the annual sum of one dollar in advance. Honorary membership may be conferred upon eminent Catholic gentlemen, or patrons of the Association.

The means necessary for the successful establishment of any institution of this character, are seldom within the immediate reach or control of those who actively engage in the enterprise, whilst small contributions from those who approve and sympathize with their efforts, might enable them to accomplish the object in contemplation—the beneficial effects of which the most sanguine among us may not venture to calculate.

We therefore earnestly invite the attention of our fellow-citizens to the objects we have in view, and solicit their co-operation with us, in the hope that their encouragement may be instrumental in advancing the interests of religion, and the dissemination of useful knowledge and information, and, as a necessary consequence, promoting the welfare of our beloved country, and furnishing a guarantee for the perpetuity of its wise and beneficent institutions.

Military News.

The Cotton Brokers' Guard, Captain Michael Doran, went out on a Target Excursion to "Belview Gardens," on Thanksgiving Day. They numbered 51 muskets—shouldered by men whose physical and intellectual appearance was deservedly much admired. The Guard were generously furnished with no fewer than twenty-eight prizes, for each of which they feel grateful; but especially so, for the magnificent one of the Messrs. Bramwell, Talcott & Bramwell, and also Mr. E. B. Dean's. Heller's Band discoursed the sweetest music throughout the day, and the enjoyment of the Guard, during their well-contested shooting, and subsequently at an elegant repast—where wit and wine flowed free—was intense and unimpaired. D.

The Patrick Henry Guard, Captain Robert Mansfield, on their return from their Target Excursion to Clifton, Staten Island, on Thursday, the 20th inst., honored us with a cordial salute. The company mustered fifty-five muskets, besides having a large number of pioneers. Whitworth's band accompanied them. In shooting for their thirty-two prizes they completely riddled their target. On their return, they supped at Brooks' Assembly Rooms. Toasts, speeches, song, wine, mirth and wisdom ruled supreme, extended throughout the night and far into the morning hours.

The Thomas Davis Cadets, consisting of a body of spirited young fellows—earnest followers of the truthful teachings of him whose name they bear, and banded to practice them—had a Target Excursion, to Hoboken, on Thanksgiving Day. They mustered thirty-nine muskets, and had a joyous time, both on the ground and on their return to the Rainbow Hotel, where they dined.

The O'Connell Guard, Captain Sedgwick, numbering some twenty-five muskets, well supported, went on their Target Excursion on the 19th inst. We have to thank them for the favor of a salute en passant.

In the account of the military who attended Mr. Meagher's lecture for the benefit of Captain Kerrigan's family, the Irish Fusileers, Captain Corcoran, were quite unintentionally omitted. They were there in full force.

The Taylor Guards, Captain John Deegan, paraded sixty muskets and shot for thirty-seven prizes, on the 18th of Nov. Mr. John Murphy very efficiently acted as their Secretary.

The uniformed and all other members of the Young Ireland Rifles, Seventy-fifth Regt. N. Y. S. M., and of Company C, 75th Regiment, are requested to assemble at 200 Sixth-street, on Monday, Dec. 1, at 7 o'clock, P. M.

THE LIMERICK PIPER.

(From the Tipperary Vindicator.)

"Great Haverty that painted me,
Will hear with sad emotion
His Piper's fall—just under the wall,
Where he so long held his station."
O'Brien's Lamentation.

Poor Patrick O'Brien—the Limerick Piper—now, and for some months past, absent from his old head-quarters on the Military-road, and supposed by many persons to have been dead, is still alive, but we regret to add, in great penury.

The notice to this effect published in the Vindicator induced the writer to visit the domicile of the poor old man. About three doors from the corner of Newgate Lane, on the left hand-side as you approach the Castle Barracks in Nicholas-street, poor O'Brien resides. Entering a long dark hall and ascending two flights of a very rickety stair-case, in the back room lies this aged Minstrel. The apartment is well lit, fairly ventilated and clean. On the skeleton of what must have been at one time a four-post beadstead, lay a miserable pallet, on which was stretched poor O'Brien, with scanty covering, principally consisting of the shreds of the clothes he was in the habit of wearing when he was able to go abroad. Extreme old age—he is approaching to his 90th year—and the effects of a bad fall sustained by him during last winter's frost have completely prostrated him. His voice is still strong, and his intellect as clear as ever—his recollection of olden times perfect, and his inquiries after persons whom he knew to have assisted him from time to time, show that he possesses a most tenacious memory.

He was born in the small village of Labeesheeda, in the county Clare, and educated, as was the fashion amongst the peasantry of that day, at a college held in a neighboring bog, commonly called a Hedge School. In this academy Horace, Sallust, Livy and Homer, were in more requisition than the English grammar. His knowledge of Latin he still retains to a respectable extent, and can put and answer questions in that classic tongue.

His parents were in easy circumstances—possessing a small farm of land. The son exhibiting an aptitude to learn, they were desirous to afford him the best education their circumstances could command. He was accordingly left at school longer than the period usually allowed for the instruction of youths of his class. His proficiency was such as to give promise of a prosperous career; but, alas, his sight from too close application, soon gave way. He was afflicted with a cataract which resulted in total darkness before he had reached his six-and-twentieth year. Owing to bad times—high rent—low prices, and partial failure of the crops, the family means soon dwindled. The Blind Boy having no other recourse, turned his attention to music. He procured an Irish Bap-Pipe, and learned to play upon it. He had some poetic taste—a thorough knowledge of the Irish language, and not at all deficient in English. With these aids he composed some agreeable ballads—got by heart the effusions of other bards, and contrived by great industry and exertion to keep himself alive. It is now many years since he first came to settle in Limerick, where he very soon became a favorite with the young and the old. There were none that seemed to enjoy him more than the honest kind-hearted soldiers from time to time quartered in this garrison, and none more generously contributed to his support than the red coats. It was often amusing to witness some of these jolly fellows returning at Tatto to their barracks—with their heads often lighter than their hearts, stop on the military walk—call on O'Brien for an Irish jig or a Scotch reel, and ply hard and fast at the gay dance for the few moments they had to spare, and pay the Piper handsomely when the exercise was over. Many a weary nurse had the cross little darling she was compelled to keep out for air and exercise, lulled into peace by poor O'Brien's hunting chorus or his "modereen rue."

In his youthful days O'Brien must have been possessed of a good figure and handsome features and well proportioned symmetry. Some twelve or fourteen years ago our admirable Irish artist Haverty, of whom as, an Irish painter, we all feel justly proud, during one of his professional tours through the South, having caught a glimpse of our friend O'Brien, was struck with that simple peculiarity allied to genius, struck with the fine head and figure of the man. "It was just such a head as Guido might have painted"—so he induced O'Brien to give him a few sittings, and he produced a picture into which he has introduced the piper's daughter, then young and with no mean pretensions to good looks. This work was so highly esteemed that the Irish Art Union went to the expense of having it engraved and distributed as a prize amongst their numerous subscribers.

The poor piper is no longer able to obtain the little aid that would be necessary for his support, by any exertions of his own. We trust that the generous public, to whom he has been so long known, and for whose amusement and pleasure he has so often catered, will not fail to give the little aid now required. The Rev. Mr. Ryan, the estimable and highly respectable curate of St. Mary's Parish, who is very constant in his attendance on him, will receive, with great thankfulness, the contributions of those who may be so charitably disposed as to assist this helpless creature, as anything given towards the same object to any of the respected Catholic Clergy of the city, will find its way to his humble bedside, and be dispensed to the best advantage for poor Patrick O'Brien, the Limerick piper.

Tenants on Encumbered Estates.

From the Patron.

A large portion of the soil of Ireland has changed hands since the creation of the Incumbered Estates Court, but before that tribundal will have concluded its functions, a still larger portion of the land of this kingdom will have to pass under its jurisdiction; and as each year brings some amendment in the law under which the court is constituted, we feel that Mr. Sherman Crawford has done good service in fixing attention on the operation of the present law on the occupying tenantry. We have ourselves been recently making some investigations on the subject, and, though we are not at present able to present the requisite series of statistics to demonstrate the fact, we have satisfactorily ascertained that there has been a larger number of tenants evicted from lands sold under the Court than from all the other lands in Ireland. In fact, the large evictions that have occurred within the past few years, all took place, not under the court or by its direction, but consequent on sales by the court. For these results the commissioners are in no wise blameable.

They carry out the law as they find it, and we have more than once observed that wherever the law gives them the power to extend protection to a tenant in occupation, they have exercised that power to the fullest extent. Nevertheless, the fact is, that the large evictions have been of the tenants of lands sold in the Court; and if any means existed for procuring accurate statistics on the subject, we have little doubt that the figures would show that four-fifths of all the ejectments that occurred in Ireland since 1848 have occurred on lands which passed under the anctioneer's hammer.

The Charleston (Va.) Star says the streets are filled every day with persons leaving Virginia for the West. There has not been so much emigration for years for Virginia. Sometimes there can be seen eight or ten families moving together, who intend forming a Virginia settlement of themselves in Missouri, Kansas, or some other portion of the West.

The newspapers in Michigan are complaining already that the mails are delayed by snow storms.

OBITUARY.

Loved in Life—Honored in Death.—Died in Boston, in the 62d year of his age, on Wednesday, Nov. 19th, James Barry, who for thirty years has carried on the Grocery business—known to the community as an "honest man" who, without usury or avarice, accumulated a handsome competency, leaving to an afflicted family the inheritance of a good name! He was truly—husband, father and friend! Careful, yet benevolent—"the poor walked from his door with a full sack; and he turned wormwood into sweetness with his smile: but now his wife is desolate, and his full and plentiful home has no master!" The multitude who accompanied him to his final resting-place—evidencing that the memory of a good man is blessed!

Thou art gone to the grave, but we will not deplore thee;
Though darkness and sorrow encompass the tomb,
For the Savior has passed through its portals before thee,
And the lamp of his love is thy light through the gloom.

FROM THE YOUNG FRIENDS OF IRELAND.

Whereas, By the terrible calamity which befel our country, in the lamentable loss of the steamship Pacific, with her precious freight of life and treasure, we, The Young Friends of Ireland, have to deplore the demise of one of our most worthy and esteemed associates, in the person of John McIntee. Having been associated with us for many years in all the relations of society, we ever found him true to its interests and anxious for its advancement. By his gentle demeanor and courteous behavior, he at once attracted our attention and commanded our admiration. Full of sympathy, he was ever lavish in the distribution of charity, the friend of religion, the generous benefactor of the poor. Therefore,

Resolved, That in the regretted death of our respected friend, our Society has lost a devoted and zealous member, our city a faithful and exemplary citizen, and his family a most loving and affectionate relative.

Resolved, That we sincerely sympathize with the relatives of the deceased in this their irreparable affliction, and tender to them our heart-felt condolence.

Edward Mills, President.

James E. Mills, Secretary.

HOW PAT BURKE ARRESTED HIS OWN CORPSE—A CURIOUS CASE.

Not often does one see his own funeral. Charles V. of Spain did, and so did Pat Burke of Eleventh Avenue; but he arrested his corpse while on the way to the cemetery.

Pat's is a strange story, but it is veritably true.

Pat is a laboring man, and when work is not brisk in the city, he goes to the country in search of it. He went out of town on Friday, and on Saturday his loving wife, Catherine, was brought the painful news that he had been killed on the Hudson River Railroad, at Tarrytown. She hastened to the place indicated, and there beheld and fully recognised the mutilated remains of her darlin' Pat. She put the body in a handsome mahogany coffin, and had it conveyed to her residence in the city. Here friends and neighbors assembled mournfully. The "pipes and tebaccy" were bought, the snuff passed round, and the corpse was "waked" in the "rale ould style."

The funeral was to take place on Sunday afternoon, at two o'clock, and at that hour the hearse and a large number of nice carriages, well filled with mourners, drove up to the residence of the widow Burke. The widow wept, and would not be comforted. She kissed the cold lips of her departed husband again and again, and it was with difficulty she could be prevented from taking one more last lingering look at him who was no more.

The coffin was placed in the hearse and the cortege moved slowly along towards Calvary Cemetery.

* * * * * * *

In half an hour after Pat. Burke appeared in the flesh at his own house. He saw at once that something had taken place. Thoughts of elopements and murders rushed wildly through his brain. Greatly frightened he bolted up-stairs and into the apartments of a neighbor, without as much as saying "by your leave." Two women to whom he was well known fainted when they saw the apparition, and were with difficulty revived. At last when they had sufficiently recovered to speak, they were asked by Pat. in loud and excited tones.

"What's the matter? where's me wife? Spake quickly!"

"She's gone to yer funeral, sure, Pat.—ain't ye dead?"

"Amn't I dead! what in the —— de ye mane, woman? amn't I here?"

"Arrah, Pat, jewel, you know yer dead! Sure wasn't I at yer wake meself?"

"Then, where's me corpse?"

"Gone to the burying-ground half an hour ago, amock, but ——"

Pat stopped for nothing more. He fancied how things stood, and rushing wildly from the house pursued his corpse up the avenues. He ran fast and long, and had the satisfaction of overtaking his funeral just as it was about to go on board the ferry-boat that plies to Calvary Cemetery.

"Sthop there," he cried, springing forward and seizing the head of the horse attached to the hearse. "Shtop there, I tell ye, or, by the powers, I'll massacray every mother's son of ye."

Then, rushing back to the next carriage, which contained his wife, he pulled open the door, and exhibited himself freely perspiring and greatly agitated..

The scene that ensued (as the magazinists say) may be imagined but cannot be described. The Widow Burke fainted, as did all the other women in the carriage, while the men struggled for exit through the other door. The uproar spread and the aid of the police would have been called, had not the Widow recovered from her swoon and fully recognized the presence of her dead husband.

As it was, many were not a little angered at Pat's unwarranted interference, while Pat, on seeing the corpse, was greatly chagrined that his wife should mistake "such an ugly spalpeen for her purty Pat," but when he saw his wife's pale face and tearful eyes, he thanked his stars that he had such a loving wife, and that he was not yet dead.

The hearse and its contents were turned round and driven to the dead house at Bellevue Hospital, while those who had left the wake-house mourning returned to be merry.

All admitted the joke to be a good one, except Pat, who avers that it's no joke to be buried before one's time.

An inquest upon the corpse was held yesterday at Bellevue Hospital, by Coroner Hills, and a verdict returned "That the unknown deceased came to his death by being run over on the Hudson River Railroad at Tarrytown." It was then interred in Potter's Field.

DEATH OF MAJOR EATON—GENERAL JACKSON'S FIRST CABINET.

Major John A. Eaton died in Washington on Monday, the 17th instant, in the 70th year of his age.

The famous cabinet of President Jackson, which "came together like a unit," and was dissolved, as so many ministries have been in Europe, by a pretty woman, consisted of Martin Van Buren, of New-York, Secretary of State; Samuel D. Ingham, of Pennsylvania, Secretary of the Treasury; John H. Eaton, of Tennessee, Secretary of War; John Branch, of North Carolina, Secretary of the Navy; William T. Barry, of Kentucky, Postmaster General; and John M. Berrien, of Georgia, Attorney General. John C. Calhoun was Vice President, and Alexander Macomb Commander of the Army. Of these all are now dead except Mr. Van Buren, who "still lives" at Lindenwold, and Samuel D. Ingham.

John H. Eaton was born in Halifax, on the Roanoke river, in North Carolina, in the year 1787, and was educated in the University of North Carolina, near Hillsborough. After leaving the University, he emigrated to Tennessee, where he became a member of the bar, and entering warmly into politics, rose so rapidly, that in 1818, at the age of thirty-one, he was selected by the Governor to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate.

Mr. Eaton continued in the Senate nine years, and was upon the whole a popular member. His literary abilities were respectable, his gestures graceful and appropriate, and his voice remarkably fine. He was regarded as an ultra partisan, and never for a moment swerved from his friendly fidelity to the hero of New-Orleans, whom he supported industriously and effectively, not only in his official capacity, but in numerous and able anonymous contributions to the press. The most celebrated of his productions in this line were a series of letters signed "Wyoming," which were praised as masterpieces of cogent reasoning and classical diction. Nothing submitted to the public had a more powerful influence in persuading the people of the eminent fitness of General Jackson for the Presidency. In 1817 he had signified his attachment to him by the publication of an elaborate and voluminous "Life of Jackson," which is now much sought after as one of the rare and curious books in American history.

Immediately after the inauguration of General Jackson, he sent Major Eaton's name to the Senate for confirmation as Secretary of War. It was said that Major Eaton was very well satisfied with his position in the Senate. He continued to hold it, however, until his marriage with the widow of Purser Timberlake, of the navy, whose mother kept the boarding-house in which he lived when in Washington. Mrs. Calhoun and Mrs. Ingham refused to call upon her—others followed their example, and the result was an entire breaking up of the Cabinet, in April, 1831. Mr. Van Buren went as Minister to England, Mr. Barry was sent to Spain, and on his death, at Liverpool, a few months after, Major Eaton was appointed his successor. From the time of his return from Madrid, Major Eaton was never prominently connected with public affairs.

THE THREE MONOPOLIES.

THE LAST BARRIER SURMOUNTED.—The practice of Medicine has been in the hands of three sets of monopolists. First, the Pagan Priesthood, second, the Pagan philosopher, third, the more modern Christian monopoly known as the "Faculty of Medicine." Thomas Holloway, whose remedies have restored suffering millions to health, broke through this last monopoly, and scattered its solemn fallacies to the winds. He started the grand idea that the principle of the disease existed in the elemental fluids of the patient's body, and he proferred to the sick two preparations, (the result of years of research and experiment), designed to act specially upon this primitive cause of fever, pain, debility, and functional derangement. His whole materia medica was comprised in a Pill and an Ointment. His simple plan of treatment was to attack inward disease through the internal secretive organs and the circulation, and the external disorders through the pores of the skin.

The remedies proved to be remedies indeed. They performed their allotted work. The people of England adopted them, as if by common consent. They were introduced under the government patronage into most of the nations of Europe. Soon they pervaded British India. Even exclusive China admitted them. In this country, such a vast demand for them sprung up, that Professor Holloway was constrained to visit the United States, and establish a central manufactory and depot in New York for the supply of the Western world. They are now to be found throughout Spanish America, the West Indies, the Canadas, and, in fact, in every region where the white man exercises dominion or influence. Even the last of the medical monopolies, the "Faculty" itself, no longer disputes the value of these inestimable curatives.—London Morning Chronicle.

WALLACK'S THEATRE.

THIS Theatre was opened for the season on Wednesday September 17. Its object will be, as it has been, to sustain the Drama in artistic purity and intellec ual respect. The company, through whose energies and abilities this object has been so successfully attained, will remain substantially the same as in past seasons.

It is the intention of the management to produce dramas in the same style as those put forth by Charles Kean at the Princesses Theatre, London.

LOVE IN A MAZE.
THE CORSICAN BROTHERS,
FAUST AND MARGARET,
LOUIS THE ELEVENTH.

Engagements have been offered, with every prospect of success, to several American artists of renowned fame, and to others of dawning distinction, whose genius it will be the object of the management to cultivate and encourage, and several comedies, written in this country and for this theatre, will be produced.

Medical.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eageriy asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparen expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

ELIZABETHAN ALE.

MEDICAL men now very generally recommend the occasional use of pure ale to those who are in need of nourishment ; and it is undoubtedly the most wholesome beverage for general use that can be found. This is not a new idea. In Queen Elizabeth's time our ancestors universally consumed it—from Elizabeth herself, in her palace, to the farmer in the field. In those days, adulterated wines and fiery liquors may be said to have been unknown, and very heavy penalties were enacted against using anything except malt and hops in brewing. It is not at all extravagant to assert, that the average duration of the life of a large portion of our race is a third less than it was two or three huudred years ago, and this is chiefly attributable to what we eat and what we drink. Even now the heartiest people that can be found are from the rural districts of England, who yet follow the old fashioned diet.

All who use ale, whether as a beverage or for the purpose of nourishment, will find the Elizabethan Ale most excellent. Being made on the Scotch plan, it is as pure and wholesome, (if not equal in flavor) as the imported, while its cost is but little more than a common article. Special Notices.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, New-York, Aug. 12, 1856.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That the following ordinance, relative to express wagons, carts, cartmen, &c., &c., having been adopted, its provisions will hereafter be enforced.

FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

AN ORDINANCE

To amend an Ordinanae entitled "An Ordinance for the licensing, and otherwise regulating the use and employment of express wagons, carts and cartmen, &c., &c., approved by the Mayor June 2, 1851."

The Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New-York, in Common Council convened, do ordain as follows :

That section 2 of said Ordinance, relating to carts and cartmen, be amended, so as to read as follows :

SECTION 2.—The Mayor shall from time to time license and appoint so many and such persons as he may think proper, to set up and keep public carts in said city, Provided, that no one person shall be so licensed to keep more than three such public carts.

And he shall also license so many and such persons as he may think proper, to be public cartmen of said city, and he may revoke or suspend any or all such licenses at his pleasure. All persons licensed as foresaid, to keep public carts, shall be deemed to be public cartmen, within the meaning of this Ordinance ; but it shall not be lawful for any person to receive or to hold a license to keep public carts, or to be a public cartman, unless he be a citizen of the United States, and resident within the State of New-York, and is the actual owner of the cart or carts, with good horses therefor, so licensed to be kept as public carts ; and the Mayor may examine, under oath, all persons applying for or holding any such license, or the renewal thereof, touching their qualifications as aforesaid, and all licences other than to persons so qualified shall be void.

Adopted by the Board of Councilmen, May 9, 1856.

Adopted by the Board of Aldermen, July 15, 1856.

Approved by the Mayor July 30, 1856. aug28 10t

The book will be got up in superior style, and furnished to the address of Subscribers giving their names to a duly authorized canvasser, or to P. M. HAVERTY, Publisher, 110 Fulton street, N. Y.

☞ A list of Subscribers will be printed in the work.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., July 10, 1856.

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a Subscriber to Mr. O'Mahony's translation of "Foras Feasa ar Erinn."

That is a book long wanted, and which the Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Elliott had lived, it would have been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America, a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes as Mr. O'Mahony. I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

Faithfully yours, JOHN MITCHEL.

LITTELL, SON & CO., BOSTON.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

THIS work is made up of the elaborate and stately essays of the EDINBURGH, QUARTERLY, and other Reviews; and BLACKWOOD' noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen Political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History and Common Life, by the sagacious SPECTATOR, the sparkling EXAMINER, the judicious ATHENEUM, the busy and industrious LITERARY GAZETTE, the sensible and comprehensive BRITANNIA, the sober and respectable CHRISTIAN OBSERVER; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the UNITED SERVICE, and with the best articles of the DUBLIN UNIVERSITY, NEW MONTHLY, FRASER'S, TAIT'S, AINSWORTH'S, HOOD'S and SPORTING MAGAZINES, and of Chambers' admirable JOURNAL. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from PUNCH; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of THE TIMES. We shall increase our variety by importations from the Continent of Europe, and from the growth of the British Colonies.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday—price, (free of postage) six dollars a year. Remittances for any period will be promptly attended to.

Complete sets of the FIRST SERIES, in thirty-six volumes, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principle cities, free of expense of freight, are for sale for Seventy-two Dollars. The Second Series began in 1858.

Any volume may be had separately, at Two Dollars, bound, or a Dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents—and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

☞ A few advertisements of Books, Patents, or other matters of general interest, will be added, at reasonable rates.

Extracts of Letters from Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, and President Adams.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I have read the prospectus with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give healthy tone, not only to our literature but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character.

JOSEPH STORY.

NEW-YORK, May 7, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of the "Living Age;" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates (of which I have no reason to doubt), it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. JAMES KENT.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe, and in this country, this has appeared to me the most useful. It contains, indeed, the exposition only of the current literature of the English language; but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind, in the utmost expansion of the present age. J. Q. ADAMS.

THE PANORAMA OF LIFE AND LITERATURE.

Published Monthly at the Office of Littell's Living Age,

Boston.

Every number of this work contains articles of leading interest; grave and earnest, yet not heavy; popular, and yet of abiding value. To these are added, in profuse abundance and great variety, Tales, Poetry, Voyages, Travels, and whatever—within the bounds of sound taste and good principles—may be included under the large head of Light Reading. But mere light reading soon becomes wearisome, unless there breathe from it spirit and heart, life and soul.

We promise a Magazine that shall be more and better than mere amusement: a Book suited to the leisure of the old and wise, and yet abundantly attractive to the young and ardent. It will freely provide for the Imagination, as well as for the Reason and Memory.

For THREE DOLLARS A YEAR, received at the office of publication, the Panorama will be sent (free of postage), to any post-office in the United States.

Two COPIES, Five Dollars a year; FIVE COPIES, Ten Dollars a year, Clubs to pay their own postage, which is three cents a number, payable QUARTERLY IN ADVANCE.

The first number was issued in July, 1855. It makes two large volumes a year. We can supply orders for back numbers or volumes.

Both Works are Published by Littell, Son & Company, Boston.

St. Joachim and St. Anne.

Illustrated by fine Steel Engravings, and printed on superfine paper, with Chapter Headings, Borders, and Initial Letters, designed and engraved expressly for this work.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, is by the Rt. Rev. Romuald Gentilucci, Chamberlain to Pope Pius IX, is dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness, and approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace.

Gentilucci's work will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of ecclesiastical history that can, in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of Our Lord, as handed down in the loving tradition of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

The Life of Saint Joseph—no unfit companion for the elegant work of Gentilucci—is from the pen of Father Vallejo, a Mexican Jesuit of the last century, a work approved by the ecclesiastical authorities of the Roman States, and frequently reprinted.

CONDITIONS.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, Her Holy Spouse and Parents, will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a Steel Engraving and several Wood Cuts in each number, and will, when complete, form a volume of nearly 1000 pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

The work having received the approbation of His Holiness, himself, as well as of the illustrious Archbishop Hughes, it only remains for us to say, that it appears to be gracefully translated into our language, and the style in which it is produced, is really superior, both as to its genera appearance, as well as to the chasteness of the design, and execution of the illuminated borders which adorn every page of the work.—London Register and Catholic Standard.

No other work of our day on the same subject can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of the learned and devoted son of the Blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are no more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in this book. The translator has performed his task admirably.—Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work, itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truth Teller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the magnificent edition of the Bible of the enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

The work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but it seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

This work, translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, we like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

INDUCEMENT.

Each subscriber to this splendid work will receive with the last number a magnificent Steel Engraving suitable for framing, of the

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of their departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; or persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

REMITTANCES.

The Horace Waters' Pianos are known as among the very best. We are enabled to speak of those instruments with some degree of confidence, from personal knowledge of their excellent tone and durable quality.—N. Y. Evangelist. ap19tt

Daguerreotypes.

Mark the Facts!—J. GURNEY'S establishment, No. 349 Broadway, corner of Leonard street, is the oldest and most extensive in the United States. GURNEY was the first to introduce the Art of Photography in this city. GURNEY has recently made important alterations and improvements in his establishment. GURNEY has now greater facilities for producing finer work in every branch than has heretofore been produced in this country. GURNEY has still in his employ the best of his old artists. GURNEY has recently added to the above a talented corps of American, French, and German artists. GURNEY'S colored Photographs of all sizes need only to be seen to be appreciated; they speak for themselves. GURNEY'S plain, unretouched Photographs were never equaled—so say artists and the best judges. GURNEY'S Daguerreotypes are universally pronounced superior productions. GURNEY has received more testimonials for his skill than any other artist in the profession. GURNEY received the only medal for Photographic productions at the late Paris Exposition—consequently, GURNEY stands at the head of the world in the Photographic Art. GURNEY has not removed any branch of his business to any part of the city. GURNEY has no connection with any other establishment in any part of the city. GURNEY attends personally to his patrons and friends, and has done so for the last sixteen years. GURNEY will be most happy to continue that attention, and will still endeavor to please all who may favor him with a visit to his Photographic Palace of Art. J. GURNEY,

FACTS

THAT NEED NO MARKING.

Progression.

From Humphrey's Photographic Journal of Sept. 1856.

We do not approve of the plan of puffing the members of the Photographic profession by way of personals. This may do very well when one is trying to bring his works into favor with such as are susceptible to flattery, and measure out their support according to the amount of editorial ink used as bait. We feel confident that those who best know will agree with us as that it is no puffing, when we can say with so much truth, that the Photographic Art this day owes, in no small degree, its position in this country to Mr. C. D. FREDRICKS, a gentleman who was the first to introduce the Photographic process upon an extensive scale in America. Previous to his establishing himself here, he visited Europe, and, with an enterprise worthy of imitation, he was not satisfied with first securing what knowledge he could himself gain, but also engaged the services of several of the most eminent Parisian Artists. He then, in connection with Mr. GURNEY, opened an establishment on a plan unequaled in the world.

After successfully following his profession, in connection with Mr. G., for some time, he has opened a "Temple of Art" in this City, under his own professorship and supervision. We have honestly and candidly presented the foregoing, feeling that is justly due to a fellow-laborer.

FACTS WHICH ARE KNOWN.—PHOTOGRAPHS DAGUERREOTYPES, AMBROTYPES, &c.—The undersigned having removed the Photograph department and his Parisian artists from his old place of business, No. 349 Broadway, to his new and magnificent establishment, No. 585 Broadway, would call the attention of public to the fact that his Galleries, and the pictures made in them, are superior to anything before exhibited. Those desiring Photograps, Daguerreotypes, or Ambrotypes, executed by artists of refined taste, would do well to call and judge for themselves. European News.

By the arrival of the British steamer Persia, we have dates from Europe to the 15th ultimo. We have accounts of some gigantic frauds in the share transfer office of the Great Northern Railway in England, by which the company will lose nearly a million of dollars. These defalcations, like those lately committed on the Great Northern Railway in France, are attributable solely to the utter absence of conscientiousness, and indifference to their responsibilities exhibited by the Directors of railways. In addition to this, we learn that the cashier of one of the branches of the Bank of France had disappeared with 400,000 or 500,000 francs, say $100,000. His family offered to make up the deficiency, but the Bank refused, as he possessed a fortune of his own.

A violent gale occurred in the Mersey on the 12th ult., during which three fine American ships—the "Samuel M. Fox," and "Silas Wright," bound for New-York with emigrants, and the "Louisiana," for New-Orleans—while being towed out to sea, were driven on shore and wrecked. Fortunately, however, no lives were lost.

The English papers announce the re-establishment of cordial relations between England and France; but there is not sufficient foundation for such an announcement. The Bank of England has raised its discount to 7 per cent. upon all bills.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian thus delicately announces an approaching interesting event: "I have good reasons for believing that our gracious Sovereign is in a condition to render the direct succession to the throne a matter of even greater certainty than it is at present; and that in the month of March next it is most probable another prince or princess will be presented to the nation." The London Post says, Sir A. Cockburn will be elevated to the Chief-Justiceship of the Common Pleas; and that Sir Richard Bethell will succeed to the office of Attorney-General. No arrangement has as yet been made with respect to the appointment of Solicitor-General. With regard to the cessation of the Imperial festivities in France, the Paris correspondent of the London Times says: "It is certain that the invitations to Fontainebleau have been countermanded, to the great satisfaction of all men of sense, and of the real friends of the Emperor. His Majesty has yielded to public opinion; it would have been more graceful had he done so sooner; but even at this late hour, it is not unwelcome, nor has the news been received without pleasure. He has learned from the English press, and not from his own journals, what public opinion really was on the subject; and one of his friends in particular, whose devotion to him dates long before his prosperity, but whose frank language never has found favor with his courtiers, recently informed him how the people thought and spoke of these continued festivities." In reference to the diplomatic rupture between the Western Powers and Naples, the Ministerial organ says: "It is quite true that the Neapolitan Ministers have received intimations that their presence is felt by the English and French Cabinets to be no longer advisable at the Courts of London and Paris, and, consequently, passports are very much at their service."

According to advices received by the Ausburg Gazette, from Rome, it is positively known there that the Neapolitan Minister of Justice is drawing up a new list of the persons who are to be amnestied. The Pope is employing all his personal influence on King Ferdinand II., and hopes to be able to persuade him to put an end to his misunderstanding with the Western Powers "by a judicious compliance with their wishes."

We read in the Constantinople correspondent of the London Times:—"The Russians have made another attempt to land at Serpents' Island. They sent a steamer there to land provisions, water and clothing for seven men, as well as different materials for the lighthouse. Captain Vansittart, of her Majesty's ship Magicienne, the superior officer in command of the station, went on board, and informed the Russian commander that he could not allow him to land, but that he was ready to take off in his boat the provisions and clothing, though not the materials for the lighthouse, as the latter had been in a perfect state since the 16th of the present month, displaying a splendid revolving light after the best model, and with the latest improvements. He offered likewise to take the commanding officer with him on shore, and allow him to communicate with his countrymen. While the conversation was carried on a boat pushed off from the Russian steamer towards the island, but was prevented from landing, and the Russian steamer departed re infecta, after having given over the provisions and clothing."

The Nord announces that the Commissioners of the five great powers are to settle at Constantinople the question of the Principalities and the Black Sea, Bolgrad and the Isle of Serpents; but the Paris correspondent of the London Times is assured that, as respects that Commission and the meeting of the Congress in Paris or London, nothing is yet decided.

The King of the Belgians opened the Chambers in person on the 12th ult. His speech referred almost exclusively to local subjects. From Spain we learn of the appointment by royal decree of the members of the established Royal Council. The Vice-President is M. Martinez de la Rosa; M. Calderon Collantes, Ruiz de la Vega, General Campuzano, and twenty-four other persons less generally known, are named ordinary members of the Council. There is a report that on the anniversary of the Queen's birthday the state seige will be raised. A telegraphic dispatch of the 10th ult. from Madrid, states that a circular has been promulgated prohibiting the press from discussing religious questions, matters relating to foreign sovereigns, and Socialist doctrines.

The projectors of the Atlantic Telegraph Company have published an announcement of their anticipation "that they will have the cable completed in time to lay it in the Summer of 1857, and under any circumstances, not later than the Spring of 1858."

The Indian mail was to leave Alexandria on the 6th Nov., with advices to Calcutta to Oct. 9; Bombay, Oct. 18; Madras, Oct. 15; Ceylon, Oct. 16. Preparations continued on a large scale for the expedition to the Persian Gulf. A detachment from the Persian army before Herat had captured the Affghan city of Furrath, sending the governor a captive to Teheran. The dates from Cabul are to the 1st of Oct. Herat still held out, The Directors of the Great Indian Peninsular Railway have issued an advertisement for tenders for a line from Wassma to Nagpore, a distance of 487 miles. The native troops at Peshawur were suffering very severely from fever. The Bombay money market was easy. The government loan was making little progress. The prices of imports were steady. At Calcutta there was no material alteration in the condition of the market.

DEFENCE OF RUSSIA FOR THE NON-PERFORMANCE OF TREATY STIPULATIONS.

(From the Le Nord.)

The English journals at first appealed boldly to the prejudices and passions of the people. Being well convinced that they cannot persuade public opinion, they endeavor to stem and overwhelm it by their imperious and haughty declamations. But amidst all this turbulent flux of assertions, we seek in vain for any new reason in favor of the refusal of Austria and England to evacuate the Principalities and the Black Sea, as France calls for, by the terms of the treaty of March 30. It is always the same declarations about the ambition of Russia.

The Isle of Serpents! We ought really take no notice of that petty affair. Russia occupied the rock before the war, and has desired to occupy it since for the sake of general commerce. Russia confides in the Powers which signed the general treaty, and it is, no doubt, not a very abominable crime to have dared to count on their justice and wisdom. The reproach of having demolished certain works of attack or defence in the fortresses restored to Turkey in Asia, would be more grave if it were more precise and better founded.

International law on this point has very uncertain principles, and Vattel does not hesitate—after having established that the holder must restore the fortresses in the condition in which he found them at the moment of peace, to declare that if some works have been added he can demolish them. As to the affair of Bolgrad, that is the object of the fiercest declamations of the English press; according to it, it is a formal violation of the treaty. What, however, does the treaty say? "The new frontier shall pass to the south of Bolgrad." What say Austria and England? That the new frontier shall pass to the north of Bolgrad. There is, consequently, a manifest contradiction. And yet the terms of the treaty, which is deposited in all the chancelleries of Europe, are formal. The Congress of Paris clearly said to the south. But it is said that the Congress of Paris made a mistake—that it ought to have written the north. It is possible, in fact, that the Congress of Paris may have made a mistake. But, if so, what other authority than itself can correct an erroneous decision? Who can amend a treaty, if not the powers which concluded it?

Evidently imaginary grievances, pretexts and simulated motives are sought for, in order to break a peace, the conclusion of which compromises political ambitions, or to gain over the weakness of allies surprised by such clamors. The English journals no longer reason—they have no serious argumentation to bring forward. They declaim, they insult, they calumniate, they do violence to public opinion. That has been the part played in Europe in all times, and perhaps European Governments have been wrong hitherto in not opposing to this instrument of domination, which the English Government knew so well how to use in order to agitate their people, not interdictions or restrictive measures, which would perhaps only add to its force by repressing it, but a similiar power, capable of resisting it as they oppose cannon to cannon.

From the London Star.

We most earnestly bespeak the attention of our readers to the present political situation of this country in its relations to the rest of Europe. It is vain to disguise from ourselves that the aspect of affairs is becoming most serious and menacing, and that there is every probability, unless an energetic public opinion interposes, that we shall find ourselves involved in another war, more fierce and deadly than the last, and under conditions infinitely less favorable to ourselves. What are the facts? We shall endeavor to state them as clearly and as calmly as possible, and all the more so as it is the evident aim of the ministerial journals to conceal them from the public in a cloud of bluster and blarney.

The first fact, then, that stares us in the face, is this: That England stands at the present moment almost alone in Europe. The French alliance, of which we have boasted so long and so loudly, is virtually, if not formally at an end. We do not mean to say that there is any thing like an open diplomatic rupture. We do not mean to say that the appearances of concord and professions of endearment may not be kept up more sedulously than ever. But we do say that, notwithstanding the superficial, patching recently effected by the intervention of M. Persigny and notwithstanding the leaded type of the ministerial journals, there is between the two Governments an utter divergence of opinion on every subject of general European interest. They differ on the mode of dealing with the Italian question, and hence the ridiculous abortion in which the loudly-vaunted Neapolitan intervention has issued; they differ on the future constitution to be given to the Danubian Principalities; they differ on the prolonged occupation of these Provinces by Austria, and of the Turkish waters by England; they differ on the interpretation of the article in the Treaty of Paris relating to the limitation of the Bessarabian frontier; they differ as to the time, the place, and the circumstances under which the Congress should be reassembled; their policy at Constantinople is one of open antagonism, the two Ambassadors engaged in incessant intrigues to circumvent and trip each other up; and above all, they differ broadly, glaringly, irreconcilably in their estimation of the spirit and intentions of Russia, as witness the language of the French Emperor to the Russian Ambassador, compared with that of Lord Palmerston at Manchester and the Mansion-house. This being the case, may we not ask what are the points of agreement on which, in the face of so many points of repulsion, the entente cordiale can be supposed to rest? We recite these facts not with pleasure, but with the deepest sorrow and regret. But they are facts, and what avails it to deny or disguise them?

Political Soirees in London.

Ernest Jones, the Chartist leader, gave his second political soiree at St. Martin's Hall. The attendance was large and the platform was ornamented with several silk banners, containing inscriptions which asserted the right of the working-man to partake to the fullest extent of the products of his own labor.

Mr. Jones, on presenting himself, was loudly cheered. He said, in pursuance of his promise he had the pleasure of again meeting them, for the purpose of conveying some political and social instruction to the public of this country, and he was happy to be able to inform them that the hall had been taken for the next four months. [Cheers.] These efforts were made with the assistance of some friends to the spread of social and political truth, and especially of Mr. Gregory, an eminent merchant of the city of London, and the author of an admirable work on misrule in high places. [Cheers.] Some portions of the press supposed that he was pecuniarily interested in these "soirees," but he was there gratuitously, and Mr. Gregory, who acted as the treasurer, would apply any profits that remained after the expenses had been paid to the propagation of political truth. [Cheers.] Politics were hitherto confined to the tavern and pot-house, and it was the object of the "soirees" to introduce them on a more appropriate stage, and to accompany them with musical and social recreation. [Cheers.]

The first part of the musical programme, was then proceeded with. It included the Song of the Day Laborers, and a Song of Resurrection, two odes written by Mr. Jones, and sung by Mr. Lowry and two other vocalists.

Mr. Jones then proceeded to deliver a discourse "On the Fabric of the British Constitution," which he described to be founded in the darkness of the middle ages, and to be one of the vilest shams, and greatest legislative curses ever inflicted on a people. The British Constitution, he said, represented two elements alone, land and money, but was mainly founded on the monopoly of the land. He traced the history of the country from the period of the Norman Conquest to the present time, and endeavored to prove that all the legislative enactments of Parliament were founded the principle of monopoly and a landed aristocracy. Mr. Jones thus concluded: As the land is the fountain of all material blessings, so a landed aristocracy is the fountain of all social curses. All others are but the side currents, flowing out from that polluted source.

Leave the land untouched and Heaven itself will never grant you happiness. The land—it is the sacred altar, whence labor, that true worship, sends from its fields and gardens the sweet incense most acceptable on high; the land—it is the safety of a people—the emerald shield that God has given nations to hold between themselves and misery; the land—it is the radiant armor that clothes the shining limbs of liberty. My countrymen, we have been bereft of that defense. Its glorious guard has been stripped from you, leaving you naked, shivering to the blasts of want. Join with me for the re-conquest of the land, it is the task of the age—the mission of the century. You talk of unchaining yourselves; unchain the land, and your own chains will fall. The franchise is the bond that binds your hands; but land monopoly is the dungeon that surrounds your bodies.

Reception of the Russian Ambassador by the Emperor Napoleon.

The Moniteur publishes the address of the Russian Ambassador at his reception, on the 11th inst., at the Tuilleries, and the Emperor's reply. Count Kisseleff spoke as follows:

"Sire: The Emperor, my august master, in appointing me his Ambassador to your Imperial Majesty, charged me to devote all my care to cultivate the relations of friendship which unite the two Empires. I shall consider myself happy if, at the end of my career, I may have contributed to cement between France and Russia that union which secures to the general peace one of its most durable guarantees. In the name of my august Sovereign, I have the honor of presenting to your Imperial Majesty the credentials with which I am furnished, and I venture to hope that you will receive with kindness the homage of my profound respect."

The Emperor replied:—

"Monsieur le Comte: Since peace was signed, it has been my constant endeavor, without weakening my old alliances, to mitigate, by generous conduct, (de bons procedes,) whatever might seem harsh in the strict execution of certain conditions. I have learnt with pleasure that my Ambassador at St. Petersburg, animated by these sentiments, has known how to win the esteem of the Emperor Alexander. The same reception awaits you here—do not doubt it; since independently of your personal merit, you represent a Sovereign who so nobly knows how to impose silence on the sad memories that war too often leaves, in order that he may only think of the advantages of a sincere peace by means of friendly relations."

A Fatal Duel.

A letter from Aix-la-Chapelle, in Galignani's Messenger, describes a fatal duel, which took place near Manheim, on the 28th ult., between Monsieur D——, a French journalist, and a Prussian officer named B——. In consequence of some observations of an offensive nature made by B——, in speaking of the French Government, D—— requested him to retract the language which he had uttered. Matters would probably have been arranged satisfactorily, had not D—— become impatient at the hesitation of the Prussian officer, and permitted himself to call the latter a coward. A duel was instantly decided on, and as it was already half-past five in the evening, no time was to be lost. The antagonists, therefore, crossed the Maine, and proceeded to Ludwigshaven, a neutral territory situated in Bavaria. The pistol was the weapon chosen, and the two adversaries placed themselves in position and fired at a given signal. Neither was injured, but that circumstance increased the rage of the principals who refused to listen to the conciliatory language of their seconds.

The Prussian officer was particularly violent, and asserted that fear alone prevented D—— from pursuing the duel to death. It was then decided that in order to allow no chance of escape to one of the antagonists, a single pistol should be charged, and that the principals should choose the arm with their eyes closed, and then fire at three paces. This was accomplished by the pair, who then took their ground. The Prussian fired first, but fortune had betrayed him, as D—— remained unhurt. The latter, in his turn, aimed at his adversary, who, pale and with contracted features, awaited his fate, which was no longer doubtful. The finger pressed on the trigger, but by a providential chance the cap alone exploded, the pistol not going off. The seconds of D—— then declared the honor of both parties satisfied; but the Prussian officer insisted on blood being spilt, and, after a lengthened discussion, he obtained that a duel with swords should take place. The seconds insisted however, that at the first blood drawn the affair should then terminate. The principals then placed themselves in position, and after a severe struggle, D——, in parrying a feint, exposed his body to the the sword of his adversary, who delivered two thrusts in succession, the first of which struck the right arm, and the second pierced the chest of the unfortunate D——, who expired a few minutes after.

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

An occurrence of a very remarkable kind took place at the Custom-house, Pill, near Bristol. One of the boatmen was in the act of entering the watchroom for the purpose of looking out, when he heard a curious hissing noise, and on attempting to ascertain by what it was occasioned he saw a large snake on the floor. The creature at first crested himself up, but in a moment darted into a corner, and coiled himself up. The man immediately got his Jersey shirt, for the purpose of throwing over it, when the venomous reptile again began to rear its crest, apparently with the intention of darting at his assailant. The surveyor, Mr. Fairburn, anticipating danger, very discreetly gave orders to kill the reptile, which was affected with a piece of rope. The snake, which is of a foreign species, and exceedingly venomous, measures twenty-eight inches in length, and has a bright yellow mark round the neck. It is conjectured that it must have by some means been brought from an African or other foreign ship, on board of which the officers had been to rummage. At the time when it was discovered there were several children about the place, and a bedroom close to the watch-house is slept in by some of the younger branches of Mr. Fairburn's own family.

The Russians use wooden spoons, with a very short handle and a very capacious bowl. The bowl will hold about as much as a tumbler. It was one of these spoons, says Mr. Russell of the Times, which so alarmed the Irish soldier, through the medium of his own false but very natural logic. The first night the gallant 46th had to march into the trenches before Sebastopol, they met a regiment returning from their 24 hours sojourn in that interesting resort; and of course they had a halt of half a minute or so; for the new-comers, so suddenly plunged into that maze and mud and misery out of the pleasures of Windsor and shipboard, were anxious to hear whatever they could about a place so unpleasantly novel. One of the veterans, who spied a friend among the 46th, as a token of his regard handed him one of the utensils mentioned above, and said, "Here, Jemmy! here's a Rooshian's spoon that we tuk in a rifle-pit last night; you'll find it handy for yer soup, when ye get any." His friend, the recruit, surveying its enormous dimensions with the greatest horror, exclaimed, "Oh! Sergeant Jones! am I to be expected to fight the fellows that feed themselves with spoons like that?"

A writer in the Edinburgh Review, for September, estimates the number of actual natives in London at less than one-half of the whole population; in other words, more than half of that population consists of country people! London is an omnium gatherum, not only from all parts of England, Scotland and Ireland, but from abroad as well. There are no less than 110,000 Celts from Ireland in London, 37,000 Devonshire people, 34,000 Hampshire people, and so on. The 30,000 Scots are a modest contribution by comparison with the country English and Irish in London; and, therefore, the Scots seem scarcely to merit the reputation they have for "coming south." as far as regards the great English centre at least. There are even 30,000 foreigners resident in London, 10,000 of them German, and 70,000 French.

The brief held by the celebrated William Pitt at the Devon summer assizes of 1781, and believed to be the only one in which the famous statesman appeared as counsel, is in the possession of the Rev. J. P. Hugo, vicar of Exminster, near Exeter. The title of the action was "Williams, gent., v. Peyton, jun., Esq." Pitt was retained for the defendant, and the retainer and fee paid with the brief only amounted to the modest sum of five guineas. It does not appear from this interesting document whether the future politician and premier gained or lost his cause.

Mr. Henry Hill, owner of Rogerthorpe, winner of the Goodwood Cup this year, has challenged the Yankee Division to run, at weights for age, any one of their horses, to be named at the time of making the match, and by way of accommodating their avowed taste for a heavy stake, and a scope of ground, the distance to be four miles, and the stake £4,000.

American News.

Within a week more than one hundred vessels have arrived at Gloucester from the Bay of St. Lawrence, with fares from ten to three hundred barrels of mackerel. Many of these vessels came home with from fifty to one hundred barrels after an absence of three or four months. The season at one time promising to terminate so favorably, will wind up in many cases in a most disastrous manner, and the crews have but little money coming to carry them through a hard winter. The larger part of the fleet have now arrived, and such is the small catch of mackerel, that the prices must greatly advance, as the supply cannot meet the usual consumption. The prices of mackerel, from some cause, have been much depressed, and have made even large trips much less than last year in value.

A runaway couple from Waterville, Me., one day last week, went to Farmington and were married. Their enjoyment of the honeymoon was interrupted after a day or two by the arrival of the young lady's father, who took forcible possession of his daughter and was about to carry her home. The affair getting noised about, however, the villagers assembled about the hotel, and insisted that the man should have his wife, giving the father five minutes to surrender her or they would take her out of his hands. The old gentleman was obliged to give in, and the runaway couple were restored to each other's arms in the presence and amidst the huzzahs of the crowd. The old gentlemen finally came round, as fathers alway do in such cases, and an amicable adjustment of difficulties occurred.

The Detroit Tribune says that some ten days since Mr. Wm. Sloan, of Kentucky, arrived in that city, having in charge 15 slaves, whom he is desirous of settling in some favorable location in that State or Canada. They are manumitted by the terms of the will of Thomas E. Chambers, of Spencer County, Kentucky, who, besides giving them their freedom, bestowed upon them twenty thousand dollars to provide for their settlement in the North.

It is said that a considerable business is done in selling bogus railroad tickets and conductors' checks for tickets, in many of the more prominent cities of the West. Those wishing to travel on railroads, should never purchase tickets of persons who hawk them about. The regular offices of the companies are the only safe places at which genuine tickets can be obtained.

We find in the Lockport Courier an account of the suicide on Sunday last, near Geneva, of Lieutenant Truman K. Walbridge, 4th Artillery, U.S.A. Lieut. Walbridge had been ordered to his post at Florida after a brief leave of absence. He left New-York, but returned to Geneva, and put an end to his life, as stated, by shooting himself with a pistol.

ALL THEY BOAST TO BE.—Two champion safes of Herring's patent have passed through the trial by fire and stood the test. One was contained in the store of E. H. Herrick, No. 28 Coenties slip, and the other in the upholstery warehouse of O'Sullivan & Fay, No. 436 Pearl-street, destroyed on Friday night last. The safes were exposed to the flames, and the books and valuables they contained were preserved uninjured. It is needless to say that the proprietors of these establishments at once ordered the Champion Safes, with the newly patented improvements of the ingenious manufacturer. The certificates of Mr. Herrick and Messrs. O'Sullivan & Fay are evidences of their estimate of the value of the safes, built by S. H. Herring & Co., and sold at their depots, corner of Water and Pine-streets, and No. 5 Murray, near Broadway.

Mr. Geo. P. It will not be the adventurous alone, says the Daily News, who are attracted to the new land of promise in Central America, but men of action and judgment will find there ample field for success. The opportunities offered by the Government of Nicaragua to settlers are most liberal. Land is given to the colonists and a free passage. The agent here is Col. Frank Anderson, whose statements may be implicitly relied on. He knows the climate and the country, and will give advice to those who propose to colonize in Nicaragua. His office is at No. 3 Broadway.

Lieut. John T. Walker, of the Navy, committed suicide by hanging himself, on the 25th ult., at his lodgings in Chambers-street. Tom Thumb's mother was robbed on the 24th ult., at the 27th street railroad depot, of her carpet bag, which contained $700: $300 in bills, and a check for $400. About noon the check was returned through the post to the Paying-Teller of the Nassau Bank, accompanied with a note, regretting that the check amount was not in bills, &c.

If people will make a chimney of their nose, says the Ohio Farmer, the best way is to furnish cheap fuel. We are, therefore, pleased to find, on page 207, vol. 2, of the Patent Office Report, for 1855, a "preparation of maize leaf, as substitute for tobacco; patented February 20, 1855." To soak maize leaf in a diluted extract of quassia and capsicum, in the proportion of one pound maize leaf to four ounces of quassia, and half an ounce of capsicum, will produce, it is said, a good substitute for tobacco, in the manufacture of cigars. Now a better substitute exists without any patent, in the sun-flower leaf, gathered and cured in the same manner as tobacco. It is far finer in flavor, burns equally well, and is not so nasty. We are not sure but the inside of many of our "Havanas" is sun-flower leaf.

On the 10th ult., a serious accident took place at the Cork terminus of the Cork and Bannon Railway. A porter, named Redmond Barrett, was engaged in shifting some horse-waggons, when he was partially knocked down by the buffet of one of the waggons, and stumbling across the rails, the wheels of the waggon passed over his foot, mangling it in a horrid manner. He was removed to the South Infirmary, where every attention has been paid to him, but he resolutely refused to permit the limb to be amputated, although informed by the medical men that the operation is absolutely necessary.

Irish News.

PARDON OF POLITICAL CONVICTS.—The following paragraph appears in the London Observer. Lord Palmerston's stale slander about a breach of parole is impudently repeated. "This high act of royal clemency" is not worth a counterfeit halfpenny: "The Queen has signified her pleasure that a full and free pardon should be granted, under the Great Seal of Great Britain and of Ireland respectively, to all persons suffering under the consequences of conviction for political offences. This full and gracious measure will be of the greatest consequence to many of those suffering punishment or privation for political acts, especially those like Mr. Smith O'Brien, O'Doherty, &c., in Ireland, and Frost, Williams, and Jones, in England, who were convicted of high treason, and sentenced to death, with all the accompanying disqualifications consequent upon so serious a crime. What had hitherto been been done merely remitted the punishment inflicted in each case, but a pardon under the Great Seal restores the individuals to all their civil rights and station as they stood before trial. They can now possess and inherit lands, and enjoy all the privileges and dignities in the State. This high act of royal clemency, of course, does not include those who broke their parole, or incurred the additional penalty of flying from the sentence of the law."

The world, says the Limerick Observer, is familiar with Gallagher's story of the man who, having taken cold for the first time in his life, was unable to account for it except upon the supposition that, having slept the night before in a field, he had forgotten to shut the gate after him! At the last fair of Quin, a respectable man, a native of "the Land o' Cakes," having sold some cattle, turned homewards. At Bradford he resolved to stay the night, ordered his dinner, drank only a bottle of porter or so, and looked out at the stars. What influence those silent gazers from the Empyrean may have had upon him we cannot tell, but he altered his mind about his lodging, and set out, as he thought, to continue his journey. Mistaking, however, his right hand for his left, he turned back upon his road, and got pretty far in the wrong direction, when, feeling tired, he turned aside into a field, where the Phooca would seem to have fairly taken possession of him, and conjured up before his disordered fancy visions of the snug inn at Bradford, and a bedchamber comfortably furnished. Taking a thornbush for the back of a chair, he hung his clothes upon it, the hat adorning one bough, the coat another, and the precious waistcoat—the pockets of which contained the large sum of money which he had received at the fair—was thrust carefully into the dyke amongst the branches. Neck-tie and unmentionables were next deposited; shoes and stockings carefully placed by the side of the supposed bedstead—the ditch—and turning down the misty bedclothes, the deluded farmer turned in upon the downy grass with nothing on him but his shirt! A short nap most probably sufficed, for, failing to warm himself by drawing his imaginary coverlet closer, he at length became, like the poor Parisian poet in La Esmeralda, painfully conscious of the fact that he was freezing! He turned out to look for the bed-clothes, and was surprised to find that the floor of his room had become overgrown with grass. He turned round to look for the bed he had just risen from, and lo it had vanished. He set about searching for the very house itself, but nothing, save leafless hedges, and rough low walls could he see, until, pursuing his search, he passed through a gate and found himself upon the high-road without the slightest clue as to where he was, or how he came to be on an unknown road in his shirt at the dead hour of the night! He pushed on at all hazards for a mile or so, until he reached a gentleman's lodge, where he knocked, and was of course refused admittance at such an hour, and under such suspicious circumstances. Meantime his host at Bradford not knowing his change of mind, became alarmed at the non-appearance of his traveller-guest to claim his bed, and knowing that he must have had a large sum of money with him, the landlord very considerately and with the most praiseworthy alacrity gave information to the police, whom the Inspector or Sergeant in charge at once despatched in various directions. One of the parties met the shivering sprite, covered from up in the Chief's large cloak, and taking up the slender clue he was able to give them of the place to which he "had been so strangely transported from his comfortable bed at Bradford," over traced out the field where his clothes still fortunately adorned the bushes, and where the money in his waistcoat was still stowed safely away, "invested in the Clare Bank!" which proved for the nonce a safer one than the Tipperary for the unco canny Scotsman.

On the 11th ult. the Tenant League held the first meeting of the session in Dublin. Speaking of it the Nation says:—"It was earnest, hopeful, and enthusiastic, and its light should bring cheer to those who once upheld the cause, but now look on with apathy, while a few men gallantly stand to the old colors and maintain against heavy odds the only struggle now being waged in defence of the Irish race. The faithful tenantry of Ireland, whose hearts neither war nor want could banish their faith in God and love of Erin, are being slowly pauperised and driven off the old soil for want of a measure of the commonest justice, for want of a measure their countrymen might obtain for them if they would only combine and make a little exertion. At the present moment those who wish well to the tenant cause, but who fold their hands and do nothing, who only doubt and despair, are the most guilty parties in the country. It is idle to say that because there is no famine in the land, the people require no defence. At the best of times the landlord and tenant law as it stands is a terror and a scourge to the people, and unfortunately we have too much reason to think our trials are not yet ended. Neither the famine, nor the plague, nor England have done with us yet, and it is now, while there is something like the glow of health in the country, that something can best be done to shelter and secure the people against these bitter foes. Let those who will, desert the cause of the Irish Tenant, but let those who profess to care for it, and hope for its success, rally round the national army, strengthen it, and improve it if they can."

On the 23d ult., Constable William Johnson proceeded on some duty with his party, and, after scouring the mountains of Glenlark, county Tyrone, and traversing several other smuggling localities, discovered in the townland of Strahull, an extensive excavation, adjoining a dwelling-house, containing eight large sacks full of ground malt, a copper worm, and a number of casks, some of which contained illicit spirits, and several other articles. The same party at the same place, observed marks of ale in the kitchen of the same dwelling, and in prosecuting the search, they ultimately raised, within a small space of the place, a sunk barrel, containing eighty gallons of pot-ale.

Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald, the Attorney-General, has subscribed £5 towards the establishment of a free library in Ennis.

A steeple-chase match, which excited considerable interest, came off on the 8th ult., over the Clonkelly course, Parsonstown. Heats between Mr. Walsh's br. g. Prince Ernest, and Mr. Blake's (18th Royal Irish) br. g. Kangaroo, The former ridden by Mr. Hand, 63d Regiment, and the latter by Captain Butler, 57th Regiment. Owing to the well-known character of the horses and jocks, a large attendance was on the course. At the first heat, Prince Ernest went away with the lead, which he kept to the first wall, where Kangaroo collared him; both then ran head and head until they came within two lengths of the winning-post, where Paince Ernest was landed first by a short neck. On the second heat, Kangaroo went off first, closely followed by the Prince. After crossing the first fence, the riders put on the steam, and the horses ran head and head to the high bank near the road, at which Prince Ernest overjumped himself, and threw his rider, who quickly regained his saddle. At this time, Captain Butler sent his horse along at top speed, but on coming to the high wall, the horse endeavoring to swerve, went through it, and spun his gallant rider. The Prince came up, jumped the wall in style, went on with the running, and came in an easy winner.

We have been recently led to notice, says the Limerick Observer, a building which is fast progressing, in the rear of Trinity Church, and opposite the intended railway terminus, the Protestant Orphan Hall, which is mainly intended for that most interesting and inoffensive charity, a charity which intereferes not with any opposite creed, and is entirely unconnected with politics. The plan of the building was executed by our young and talented fellow-citizen, Mr. William Fogarty, who bore off the prize from several able competitors, and the works have been entrusted to Mr. William Doran, as contractor. It will present a handsome front of 84 feet, with a square tower at one end and beautiful portico entrance annexed. There will also be a richly ornamented entrance at the other end, rising to the second or gallery story. The doorways, windows, quoins, &c., are of the most elaborate kind, beautifully wrought in chiselled limestone, and, when finished, it will exhibit a coup d'œil not to be surpassed for elegance and taste. It will, when the galleries are completed accomodate nearly 1,200 persons.

About ten o'clock on the night of the 9th ult., the house of a man named Dennis Dooley, a shoemaker, who lives in Grove-street, Roscrea, was attacked by persons armed with stones. On Dooly's son (John) presenting himself, he was assaulted by three persons, who knocked him down and killed him immediately by repeated blows of stones on the head. The police, under the charge of Head-constable Routledge, were soon on the spot, and succeeded in arresting two men (brothers) named Carroll, who had stones in their pockets, one of whom is a soldier on furlough, and who has been identified as having taken part in the outrage. The deceased was a well-behaved young man, and belonged to the Tipperary Militia Artillery.

On the 5th ult., a deputation from Arklow had an interview with the Chief Secretary, in presence of the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, at the Castle, to present a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, on behalf of the fishermen who had transgressed the law in taking goods from the wrecked ship Irrawaddy. The Rev. Mr. Redmond, who was the spokesman, pleaded forcibly for the men. He stated they had acted in ignorance of the law, but had now become sensible of their error, and were sorry for it. The reverend gentleman detailed the humane services rendered on numerous occasions by the fishermen, saving hundreds of lives and a large amount of property in danger of perishing at sea. Mr. Horsman said the matter would receive the best and most favorable consideration.

The Galway papers report that a very disgraceful and wanton outrage was committed at St. Vincent's avenue, in that city. The Rev. Peter Daly has enclosed a narrow strip of ground adjoining the mill-race, which is very deep there, and planted it with evergreens and flowering shrubs. The little plantation was not only a great improvement, but served as a fence to guard against fatal casualties of such frequent occurrence in localities less protected. Some persons, it is supposed, in the reverend gentleman's absence and the darkness of the night, crushed, mangled and mutilated the shrubs, and stripped the bark off almost every one of the more forward trees, so as effectually to mar their future growth.

The first horse fair in the town of Aughnacloy was held on Wednesday, the 5th inst. The attendance of buyers far exceeded the most sanguine expectations, and the show of horses was most promising, the sales being principally effected amongst those varying from 20*l* to 35*l* in price. One dealer refused a bona fide offer of 67*l*, made by an officer of the 10th Hussars. From the extremely favorable impression made on all parties concerned, there can be little doubt of the fair, in a short time becoming of first importance. It will be continued on the first Wednesday of each succeeding month.

The Common Council of Clonmel have held a special meeting, with a view to consider what steps it is essential to take with respect to the question of Ministers' Money, and to submit communications from the Mayor of Waterford, and to obtain the sanction of the Council to his Worship's meeting those officials in conference in Dublin, with several members of parliament, to consider what course should be adopted with respect to the bill for the payment of this vexatious impost, which received the Royal assent during the last session. The majority of the Council are averse to the collection of the tax.

The weather, remarks the Boyle Gazette, during the potato digging has been so favorable that almost the entire of that root has been secured, and the quantity and quality has been found to surpass in proportion of ground occupiedany crop for the last 20 years. Excellent potatoes sold in Moeil at 2s. per cwt. Market prices range at 2s. and 2s. 4d. per cwt., and considerably more when purchased in small quantities by the poorer people.

The Galway Mercury informs us that Lord Viscount Gough gave a most hospitable feast to near one hundred and fifty of his tenants, at Loughcooter. After the feast, dancing commenced, and continued up to a late hour. The whole terminated with three loud and long continued cheers for the worthy and hospitable occupant of Loughcooter Castle.

A mendicant, named Curran, from Galmoy, was a short time since, arrested in Kilkenny, when there was found upon his person the sum of £14. The Mayor committed him to jail for 9 months, as an imposter, and sentenced him to pay for his own support during his imprisonment.

The Lord Lieutenant has granted the sum of £10 for distribution amongst Thomas and Hugh Langan, William and Thos. Gannon, in consideration of their praiseworthy conduct in capturing a gang of sheep-stealers lately convicted and sentenced to four years' penal servitude at Moate sessions.

The Limerick papers report the death of Major M'Namara, which took place at his residence, Ennistymon-house, on the 11th ult. Major M'Namara represented the important county of Clare in parliament for many years, and few men whom Providence has placed in so high a position as that held both by hereditary right in fortune, and by the elective voice of his fellow-countrymen in rank, have ever won and held the friendship and esteem of his equals, and the love, respect and veneration of his tenantry, dependents, and humbler constituents more thoroughly and generally than the deceased. The extensive estates of the late Major go to his eldest son, Lieut.-Colonel M'Namara.

A notorious burglar, named Eaden, was recently captured in Belfast. In a previous attempt to arrest him he was found comfortably seated in a room in company with other members of his fraternity. One of the detectives surprised Eaden, but he failed in seizing himbef ore he leaped out of a window into the street. Another constable had been stationed under the window, in the expectation that Eaden would try to make his exit by the door of his den, but he was considerably astounded when Eaden jumped upon his head from the window above, and both of them fell to the ground. In a moment the burglar was up and away.

While the officers and some guests invited to meet General Maunsell, were dining at the Infantry Barracks, Waterford, the bed-room of an officer immediately overhead was entered, and a drawer burst open at the back, and a sum of upwards of £30 abstracted, the most of which, however, consisted of a check on the Bank of Ireland. The robbers entered another room, but did not succeed in obtaining any booty. The thieves locked the doors behind them, and carried away the keys with them.

The Carlow Sentinel states that the parishioners of Painestown presented the Rev. J. P. Garrett with an address and a testimonial of esteem, on the occasion of the rev. gentleman's removal to the parish of Kellistown, with the living of which he was presented by his Excellency the Earl of Carlisle. The address was read by H. Bruen, Esq., after which they presented their late beloved pastor with a valuable gold watch as a token of their affectionate remembrance of his zeal and unremitting attention to their spiritual wants, while under his ministerial charge.

At ten o'clock on the night of the 11th ult., one of the Bangor cotton mills, known as the New Mill, took fire, and for upwards of two hours it raged with great violence, threatening destruction to the entire premises and the dwellings of the inhabitants who reside in the neighborhood, a number of whom were obliged to remove their stock in trade and household goods. There has been a very great destruction of property, although the building itself has escaped with but little damage. This is either the fourth or fifth time this mill has been on fire during the past four years.

The Dublin Evening Post states for some weeks past the Commission for inquiring into the condition of the Lunatic Asylums and the state of the laws relating to those institutions, has been in active operation. The members of the commission are—Sir Thomas Redington, Dr. Andrews, Q. C., Mr. Lutwidge, Mr. Wilkes, and Dr. Corrigan. The Commissioners have met daily at No. 6, Fly place, where witnesses have been examined. The Commissioners are now engaged in inspecting the various district lunatic asylums.

Mr. Hemans, an engineer, son to the distinguished poetess, has been appointed to survey a new line from Goragh Wood to Armagh. The staff of this gentleman have been busily engaged for some days past in making the necessary surveys so as to determine the best line of country for the proposed line of railway to traverse. All the other requisite steps are being taken so as to be ready at the meeting of Parliament to obtain the bill authorising the construction of the line.

The mate and two men of the schooner Mars, of Milford, from Kilrush, for Liverpool (oats), report that vessel to have sprung a leak and foundered at sea between Skillig Island and Bull Rock. These men landed at Blackball Coast Guard Station in one of the ship's boats, and supposd that the captain and two remaining men of the crew got to land at the Kerry side of Kenmare river.

The Ballinasloe Star says that a large number of the peasantry from Galway and Roscommon are leaving this season for America.

A melancholy circumstance took place at Castletown, Berehaven, on the evening of the 9th ult. A poor woman, the wife of a farmer named Trokerry, while crossing the Cloghane river, some four miles west of the town, was swept away—the river being very much flooded at the time, owing to the heavy rain which had previously fallen; her remains were discovered far down the stream, frightfully mutilated—she leaves after her a large and helpless family. It is somewhat remarkable that the son and nephew of this poor woman met their death in a similar manner, exactly in the very same place, about this time twelve months.

The Dublin Medical Gazette reports that Mr. Sony, the eminent writer on the brain, says, in a late clinical lecture on that frightful and formidable malady, softening of the brain, "I would caution you as students from excesses in the use of tobacco and smoking, and I would advise you to disabuse your patients' minds of the idea that it is harmless. I have had a large experience of brain disease, and I am satisfied that smoking is a most noxious habit. I know of no other one cause or agent that so much tends to bring on functional disease, and through this, in the end, to lead to organic disease of the brain, as excessive use of tobacco.

On the 5th ult. an accident, involving the loss of two lives, took place in Beresford street, Waterford. A man named Kearney and his helper a laboring man named Edmond Power were engaged in slating a house, when the platform on which they stood gave way and the two men were precipitated to the ground. Melancholy to relate, Kearney was killed almost instantaneously, the other man was conveyed to the Leper Hospital, where he soon after died of the injuries he received.

About four o'clock, on the morning of the 6th ult., a collision took place off Cape Clear, which resulted in the total loss of one of the vessels. The schooner Mary, of Cork. The schooner, which was on its way to Cahirciveen, came into collision with the Mangerton steamer of Limerick, bound to London with a general cargo, and went down about twelve o'clock, having floated for hours after the collision. The steamer during that interval picked off the crew, and dropped into Queenstown with them on Thursday afternoon. This is the second vessel which the Mangerton has run down.

A respectable and crowded meeting of the friends of temperance was held in the Town-hall, Waterford, on the 7th ult., Rev. Mr. Ryland in the chair. The chairman, Dr. T. L. Any day during the past month, says the Nation, the ardent admirer of England, that home of the free, champion of humanity, foe of aggresssion, and protector of weak nations, &c., might have seen an instructive sight in this city. His Royal Highness Meer Ali Moorad Khan Talpoor ex-Rais of Khyerpoor, Upper Scinde, has been visiting Ireland; and who and what he is, or rather was, is an investigation which we commend to all loyal West Britons who parroted the cry of "Russian aggression" during the late war. He is one of the plundered victims of a Power as false, as rapacious, and as brutal as ever violated justice or outraged humanity. Those who have seen him will set just value on British lies about barbarians and savages; those who know the particulars of his story—the "old, old story" of British perfidy, will be able to estimate British "morality and civilization." Though deprived of his rightful position and authority, the Prince still takes ranks as an independent Sovereign, and, his yearly income is now about £150,000; even after the last grab of the pious and Christian "India Company"—by which he was "civilized" out of nearly £100,000 per annum. His personal appearance does not at all support the British idea, though it suggests ample room for still further "civilizing" him, inasmuch as his wealth is enormous. His dress is of green silk embroidered with gold, and on his finger he wears the celebrated "Mountain of Fire," a diamond valued at £4,000—a scandalous oversight on the part of Queen Victoria's swell mobsmen; some supplemental cause of quarrel will doubtless be discovered so as to "ameliorate him out of this gem." Through all his vicissitudes, he has, moreover, preserved the great appanage of the throne of Scinde, the sabre of Tamerlane! This extraordinary weapon has been valued at £20,000; hilt and scabbard are literally frosted with diamonds, pearls, and rubies, on a ground of massive gold. In the suite of the Prince is a Beloochee Sword Bearer, who carries this royal and historic heir-loom, never upon any account surrendering custody of it for a moment to any one. During the stay of the Prince in Dublin, he had manufactured for himself and son two gorgeous dresses of gold embroidered Irish Poplin, bearing the national harp and shamrock. Indeed it is a fact we commend to the particular attention of the traders of Dublin, that His Royal Highness of Scinde spent more money in one day in patronising Dublin manufactures and encouraging Irish industry, than the Queen of England and all her children during the whole period of her visit to this kingdom.

At the New Ross Quarter Sessions the case of Whelan vs. Tottenham, came up for hearing. It was an action of ejectment of the lands of Ryleen, held by the plaintiff, a small tenant farmer, under Charles Tottenham, Esq., M. P., which has been a case of peculiar hardship on the plaintiff. It appears that the sum of 60*l*, being one and a half year's rent, became due on the 1st of May last, on which occasion Mr. Tottenham brought his action of ejectment for non-payment, and took possession of the lands under a decree obtained at the June sessions. At the time possession was taken there was a large crop growing on the lands, valued at 110*l*, but which was disposed of by Mr. Tottenham for a sum of 73*l*! The sale having taken place, Mr. Whelan tendered his rent and costs, which Mr. Tottenham declined taking, as he had in the mean time let the lands to another tenant subject to redemption. The action now brought was for recovery of the lands from Mr. Tottenham and the tenant in possession, and a decree was pronounced for the plaintiff. In the mean time, in consequence of these proceedings, Whelan had suffered a most serious injury, having lost the difference between the value of his crops and the price at which they were sold, together with the loss of his credit, and the possession of his land from the period at which possession was taken to the present; and having been in the mean time thrown on the charity of his neighbors for support of himself, his wife, and six children.

On the 10th ult., as a man named Patrick Sheehan, a servant to Mr. Leech, near Waterfall, was walking on his master's lands, in company with the butler, who carried a gun loaded with shot, a hare started out before them. Sheehan made an attempt to catch it by the legs, and at the same instant the butler, who was three or four yards off, raised his gun and fired, when the entire contents passed through Sheehan's leg, fracturing thigh bone and causing extensive laceration of the muscles and tissues of the part, which caused death immediately after his removal to the Infirmary.

THE BIG SHIP.

(From the Boy's Own Journal.)

The voyager up and down the Thames has noticed with astonishment, during the last eighteen months, the slow growth of a huge structure on the southern extremity of the Isle of Dogs. At first, a few enormous poles alone arrested his attention; then vast plates of iron, that seemed big enough to form a shield for the gods, reared themselves edgeways, at great distances apart; and as months elapsed, a wall of metal slowly rose. Sooty engineers, when questioned about it, tell you it is "the big ship;" and that is all that you can hear of it.

The great ship, or Great Eastern, as she is sometimes called, although building in the midst of the largest collection of seafaring people in the world, stands a wonder and a puzzle to them all. And, indeed, the moment you are inside the works, you feel the reason of the strange eye with which the maritime population view the monster which is slowly growing up, and overshadowing not only the ship-yard itself, but the portion of the new town immediately in the neighborhood. Where are the merry ship-carpenters, caulking away with monotonous, dead-sounding blows? Where are the artizans chipping with the adzes, rearing up one after another huge ribs, and laying the massive keel? Where are the bright augers gleaming in the sun, as sturdy arms work out the bolt-holes! None of those old accustomed sights and sounds of ship-building are to be found; but in their place we see the steam arm welding some iron shaft as "the mast of some huge admiral," or punching inch-plates of iron as quickly and as noiselessly as a lady punches card-board.

The Great Eastern is, in fact, built of iron; and such a ship of iron!—not less than 680 feet long and 83 wide! There are few persons, however, who will thoroughly comprehend the full meaning of these figures. Neither Grosvenor nor Belgrave-square could take the Great Eastern in; Berkley-square would barely admit her in its long dimension, and when rigged, not at all. In short, she is the eighth of a mile in length; and her passengers will never be able to complain of being "cooped up," as four turns up and down her deck will afford them a mile's walk. Her width is equally astonishing. From side to side of her hull she measures 83 feet, the width of Pall Mall; but across the paddle-boxes her breadth is 114 feet—that is, she could just steam up Portland-place, scraping with her paddles the houses on either side. With the exception of the sky-lights and openings for ventilating the lower saloons, her deck is flush fore and aft. However splendid this promenade might appear with respect to those of other ships, we question if it is at all too large for the moving town to whose use it is dedicated. Room must be found for the holiday strolling of between three and four thousand persons, whilst she is careering through the heated atmosphere of the tropics.

The manner in which this moving city rather than ship will be propelled with the speed of a locomotive through the ocean, is not the least noticeable of the arrangements connected with her. The builder has, we think wisely, decided not to trust so precious a human freight, and so vast an amount of valuable cargo to any one single propelling power, but has supplied her with three—the screw, the paddle, and the sail. Her paddle-wheels, 56 feet in diameter, or considerably larger than the circus at Astley's, will be propelled by four engines, the cylinders of which are six feet two in diameter, and the stroke 14 feet. Enormous as are those engines, having a nominal power of 1,000 horses, and standing nearly fifty feet high, they will be far inferior to those devoted to the screw. These, the largest ever constructed for marine purposes, will be supplied with steam by six boilers, working to a force of 1,600 horses—the real strength of the combined engines being equal to 3,000 horses. As the screw and the paddles will be both working at the same time, the ship will be pulled and pushed like an invalid in a Bath chair, and each power will be called upon to do its best. The calculated speed of the ship under steam is expected to average 15 or 16 knots, or nearly 20 miles an hour. We all know, even on a calm day, what a wind meets the face looking out of a railway train going at that pace, and consequently it can be understood that sails except on extraordinary occasions, would act rather as an impediment than as an assistance to the ship's progress. It is not probable, therefore, that they will be much resorted to, except for the purpose of steadying or steering her. In case, however, of a strong wind arising, going more than twenty-five miles an hour in the direction of her course, she is provided with seven masts, two of which are square rigged, and the whole spreading 6,500 square yards of canvas.

It is obvious that some special means must be adopted to direct this vast mass of iron as she flies on her course, threatening, by her speed, destruction to herself and whatever may cross her path in the great highway of nations. The usual contrivances will not apply. No speaking trumpets, for instance, could make the captain on the bridge heard either by the helmsman, or the look-out at the bow, more than three hundred feet away. Even the engineer, sixty feet beneath him would be beyond the reach of his voice. As in the railway we have to deal with distances which necessitate the use of a telegraph, and the Great Eastern, in this respect, will be treated just like a railway. On ordinary occasions a semaphore will, in the daytime, give the word to the helmsman, whilst at night, and in foggy weather, he will be signalled how to steer by a system of colored lights. The electric telegraph will also be employed to communicate the captain's orders to him, and to the engineer below.

The anchors of this mighty steamer would with their accessories, alone form the cargo of a good sized ship. The ten anchors with which they will be fitted, together with their stocks, will weigh fifty-five tons. If we add to this ninety-eight tons for her eight hundred fathoms of chain-cable, and one hundred tons of her capstans and warps, we shall have a total weight of two hundred and fifty-three tons, of material dedicated to the sole purpose of making fast the ship.

But we fear our readers have now scarcely a proper idea of the vast proportions of this vessel. Suppose, then, we give a comparison of her length, with the length of other ships. The lines below will do this better than words. The first lines represent the Great Eastern; the second, the Persia, the largest vessel now afloat; the third line, the Duke of Wellington, the huge 130-man-of-war, the largest in th the navy; and the fourth represents one of the gun-boats lately built for the Russian war.

Her great proportions will, indeed, almost deceive her passengers into the idea that they are sojourning in some noble mansion. Let us imagine her saloons blazing at night with gas, which will be manufactured on board and supplied to every part of the ship; let us picture to ourselves her magnificent sweep of deck filled with promenaders, listening to the band as she sails over a summer's sea; annoyed by no smoke, for, in consequence of the use of anthracite coal, none will be emitted from her five funnels; and distressed by no motion, as in consequence of her length she will stride with ease over the waves of the Pacific. We might also dwell for a moment upon the mighty larder of our leviathan prepared for her flight of five-and-thirty days, without a stoppage, across the ocean desert, with a whole town on board; or we might draw a comparison between her and the Ark (which by-the-by had not half her capacity), as she receives on board her flocks and herds to furnish fresh meat for the passage. But we believe we have said enough to enable those who have not visited the rising edifice, to realise the vast extent of this latest experiment in ship-building. And as a contrast to this fair side of the medal, let us fancy her rushing through the night in full career—an arrow 27,000 tons in weight, propelled by a bow of 3,000 horse-power. Can we, without a shudder, contemplate the possibility of a collision with such a resistless force? a line of battle ship with a thousand hands on board, cleft in two as swiftly as the apple by the shaft of Tell.

Every precaution will, indeed, be taken to avert such a catastrophe. The electric light will be fixed at the mast head, so that in dark nights the ship will carry a moonlight atmosphere wherever she goes. In case of any fatal injury to herself, which could not well happen, boats have been provided capable of taking off her passengers, even if counted by thousands. Thus she will have two screw steamers of 90 feet in length as paddle-box boats, and in addition to these she will carry a large number of the new collapsing, or bellows boats, as the sailors call them. These curious structures, the new invention of the Rev. B. L. Berthon, expand and shut like a Gibus hat or the hood of a carriage, occupying so little room that half a dozen of them of a large size can be stowed away in the same space as would be occupied by an ordinary jolly-boat, and seem to be as easily opened as a parasol or umbrella.

But there is little chance of any great accident happening to the Big Ship; that she should founder (a thing almost too dreadful to think of, since she will carry four thousand passengers) is nearly impossible. This arises from the fact that she is built in watertight compartments, having no connection with each other; so that if one part of her were to get stove in, only that compartment would suffer; and if she should even snap in halves, would float; she would live on the seas like a divided worm. Our readers, in fact, must regard the Big Ship, not as a huge house, but as a terrace, or a row of houses, having no communication one with the other; and as the houses of a terrace have all doors leading into the street, so the leading compartments of the Big Ship have all doors leading to the deck. The comparison holds good, too, in another respect—size; for in each of the compartments of this gigantic vessel you might drop one of the largest hotels in London. The compartments have iron walls.

IRISH SURNAMES.

From a Correspondent of the Dublin Nation.

During occasional visits to the step-sister country, and sometimes even at home, I have met with persons of undoubted Celtic origin—Irish often by birth, oftener by parentage—who seem to me somewhat in the predicament of the spoiled potatoes I have been speaking of. The efforts they make to divest themselves of their nationality, which they seem to consider a badge of disgrace, are in all cases ludicrous, in some rather curious and interesting. Remodelling the surname, if pronounced too Hibernian, is generally the first step taken in the process of Anglicisation. Upon this point, I shall take the liberty of offering some of the results of my observations and experience to the reader.

There is a class of Irish surnames which easily get an Anglo-Saxon look by a mere change in the spelling. Thus, by a very simple process, Neill became Neale. Haly is turned into Haley, Kealy into Cayley, and Reilly into Riley or Ryly. The addition of a letter sometimes works the desired change. A descendant of Brian Boroimhe, slipped down from O'Brien into Bryan, calls himself Bryant at last, and shabbily refers his lineage to a Devonshire or Cornish source. Boylan becomes Boyland; Gartlan changes himself into Gartland or Garland; Nowland takes the apparently humble patronymic of Noland, but boasts, perhaps, the while, that King John Sansterre was the founder of his family. There are other names in which a syllabic alteration is necessary. Thus, Langan becomes Langham, and Brennan Brenham. Cochrane is quite as Celtic a name as Corcoran, but then it is not Irish, and the bearer may, if he has impudence enough, assume the Dundonald arms, reasons sufficient to induce the son of a Cork Corkoran to call himself Cockrane in England. What dozens of Milesian Farleys have mis-pronounced themselves into Farlys! What scores of Herlehys and Hurleys claim kindred with whom Swift backed so determinedly! There is the name of MacParlan or MacFarlan—the son of Partholanus—ye gods! could any man desire a more nebulous origin? Yet, the degenerate descendant of that historic personage, first suppressing the unmistakeable "Mac," loses himself in a Farland!

"Harley, the nation's great support,"

The number of Houlihans who figure as Hollands and Wheltons are incalculable. And when again a genertion or two, the Whelton is still farther sublimated into Wilton, who will even dread that so blooming a pink of aristocracy had its root in an Irish bog? Mr. Bingley, whose father's name was Bigley in England, and had previously been Begley in Ireland, would anathematize you if you hinted at his Celtic origin, notwithstanding the stubborn fact. Have we not been told that the Nestor of the House of Lords himself—that "old man eloquent"—John Singleton Copley, Baron Lyndhurst, is not only the son of an Irish mother, Miss Singleton of the County Clare, but is also, paternally the descendant of a Celtic Collopy? We have been told this, I say, but it is incredible; for how, in that case, could the noble and learned lord have spoken of us as "aliens in blood?" Where did the ancestors of Mr. Delane of the Times come from? Was the name originally Delaney or Dilane? This is a difficulty which I do not undertake to solve. The Spillanes, from Munster, became Spelmans and Spillers in Middlesex. Langenian Kinsellas are the progenitors of London Kingsleys and Kingleys. Connacian Conroys do not wait for a trip across the channel to proclaim themselve Kings. Mooney, from Monaghan, makes Money of his name and "small blame to himself for that," he thinks noble and reasonable gentlemen, Maidstones and Villierses, do the same every day. Paddy Rooney is a name only fit for a stage Irishman; but Sir C. P. Roney is a chum for the Marquis of Chandos.

Thackeray ridicules a Mr. Clanchy who put a "De" before his name. The same affectation of Norman or Gallic descent, is remarked in a gentleman who transforms Pentony into De Pentheney. It is not many years since Lord Ventry, with the aid of the Herald's Office, discovered that his family name was not Mullins, but De Moleyns. But the most ingenious metamorphosis of this kind was that of the Mr. O'Malley, who called himself De Maillet. We may call this cooking the potato a la maitre d'hotel!

If you met, as I did once, a Mr. Grosvenor, who had nothing of the aristocratic in his appearance—who was not well dressed and who spoke with a decided brogue, you would probably be prevailed as I was, to reconcile the patronymic with the person. Can this man I ask myself, be akin to the Marquis of Westminster? Nothing of the sort, as it turned out; the Prince of Pimlico was no relative of his, seeing the man's real name was Grogan. The hon. member for Dublin is not ashamed of the name I dare say, but he can afford to call himself what he likes. My poor friend, perhaps, could not. In the same way, caterpillar Cavenaghs emerge into butterfly Cavendishes, Dinneens into Dennys, and Mulvihills into Melvilles. Absurd as all this, we can understand the vulgar motive, but it is harder to account for the miserable severity that makes one of the stout O'Riordan's, of Muskerry, hide himself in a Ritherden.

AN HISTORICAL SKETCH OF WATERFORD.

Waterford is one of the most ancientmaritime ports in Ireland. It was known A. D. 155 by the name of Cuan-na-grian, the harbor of the sun. Its present name is supposed to be a corruption from the Scandinavian of Vador Fiord, or the father. It is a county of a city, in the province of Munster, 52 deg. 15 min. N., 7 deg. 7 min. W., ninety-seven miles S. S. W. of Dublin, 111 N. E. of Cork, and eighty-four miles W. of Milford Haven. It comprises an area of 10,059 acres, of which 669 are in the city. The corporation, styled the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of Waterford, consists of ten aldermen and thirty councillors, elected by the five wards into which the city is uow divided, viz., South, West, Custom-house, Tower, and Centre wards. The mayor for 1854 was elected from the town councillors. The borough returns two representatives to Parliament, being favored with one of the additional five members granted to Ireland by the Reform Act. This city is delightfully situated on the south bank of the Suir, which, in its course from its source, waters Thurles, Holycross, Cashel, Clonmel, and Carrick, and is a river of considerable magnitude when it reaches Waterford, where it is joined by a tributary stream, the John. It is admirably situated for commerce from its proximity to the west coast of England; and, although eighteen miles from the sea, the largest merchant men can come up opposite the quays, which are decidedly the handsomest in Ireland, or probably in England, being a continuous line of 1,240 yards in length, and forty feet in width. There are only about twelve feet of water close to the quays, even in spring tides; but vessels drawing upwards of twenty feet lie afloat on the channel, and discharge or load their cargoes by means of floating stages, and rise and fall with the tide; and when the quays were erected or enlarged in 1705, it was a great mistake not to have extended them into deep water. At the western extremity it is united to the suburb of Ferrybank, in the county Kilkenny, by a wooden bridge 832 feet long, by forty feet wide, supported by forty sets of oak piers on stone abutments. It was constructed, as well as those of Derry, Ross, and Wexford, by Mr. Cox, a native of Boston, at a cost of £30,000, raised by shares of £100 each, £90 of which was paid up; and they were recently worth £170. It was opened in 1794; and the tolls produce about £4000 per annum.

In 853 Waterford was first attacked by the Danes under Sitrick, who estgblished a regal dynasty there, which continued until the Anglo-Norman invasion. Imar, one of the kings, in 995, devastated the county Kildare, and succeeded Auliffe in the occupation of Dublin. His son Reginald, erected a castle on the quays of Waterford, in 1003, a portion of which is still perfect, and is called Reginald's tower. It was held as a fortress by Strongbow, and used as a mint in the reign of Edward IV., and converted into a police barrack in 1819. In 1038 Waterford was burnt by the King of Leinster, and again in 1088 by the Danes of Dublin. It is said the Danes of Waterford did not embrace Christianity until 1096; but it is probable like those of Dublin, that it was at a much earlier date. It was then, however, formed into a see; Malchus, the first bishop, being consecrated by Anslem, Archbishop of Canterbury. The advance guard of Strongbow's invading force, consisting of ten knights and 70 archers, under Raymond le Gros, so called from his great corpulency, landed in this neighborhood in May, 1170, and was soon after joined by Harvey de Montmorisco, or Montmorris, from Wexford. They intended trenching themselves here, until the main body had arrived, and threw up a small fort, and seized on the cattle of the surrounding district. This so alarmed the inhabitants of Waterford, that they determined on attacking them before they were reinforced; and with that intent 1,700 undisciplined men, marched out of the city towards the fort. Raymond, perceiving their disorderly approach, and holding such enemies in contempt, left his entrenched position and attacked them; but they returned his charge with such vigor that he was obliged to regain it, and would, in all probability, have been forced to surrender, had he not driven out the cattle which he collected there on the assailants [this was also done by the insurgents at the battle of Ross], which threw them into such disorder, that his small force obtained a decisive victory over them; 500 of these are said to have been slain, and 70 taken prisoners, among whom were some of the principal inhabitants; and, although there were large sums offered for their ransom, they were put to death in the most cruel manner by this ferocious barbarian. According to Cambrensis, his own historian, these unfortunate captives were brought to the rocks like men condemned, where their limbs were first broken, and then cast headlong into the sea. Thus in the first onset did the English who, according to the bulls of Popes Adrian and Alexander, were to civilize the wicked and barbarous Irish, lay the groundwork of that savage and atrocious system of warfare which was perpetuated through so many centuries, with unmitigated fury. Notwithstanding this act of aggressive cruelty, this small force was allowed to remain unmolested for four months, until joined by Strongbow from Milford Haven, with 200 knights and 1,000 archers, all chosen men, who effected their landing on the eve of St. Bartholomew in 1170. MacMurrough, with his Irish forces and Anglo-Norman auxiliaries from Wexford, formed a junction with them, and an assault on the city of Waterford was determined on. The inhabitants had been reinforced by the neighboring Irish chieftains, and, under Reginald, their King, were prepared for a vigorous defence. The assailants were twice repulsed, although led on by the redoubted Raymond. On the third assault, however, a breach was made, and the besiegers entered the city, which became a scene of indiscriminate slaughter. Mac Murrough now sent for his daughter Eva, and scarcely had the carnage ceased, when her ominous marriage with Strongbow was celebrated. Henry II. landed here in October, 1172, with 500 knights and 4,000 soldiers. Strongbow, as previously arranged, made a formal surrender of Waterford to the monarch, and did homage to his principality of Leinster. MacCarthy, Prince of Desmonde, followed his example, and the inhabitants of Wexford tendered their submission with Fitzstephen as their prisoner, whom they charged with acts of the greatest atrocity. The monarch feigned displeasure, and ordered Fitzstephen to be imprisoned in Reginald's Tower, from which, however, he was soon after released. On his departure for Dublin, he placed a garrison in the city under Robert Fitzbernard and other knights, and it was soon after extended and surrounded with walls, and a charter granted to the inhabitants.

ANCIENT TOMBSTONES—CHURCH-YARDS IN THE OLDEN TIME.

From a Correspondent of the Dublin Telegraph.

Tombstones, inscriptions, &c., are of ancient origin—more ancient, perhaps, than Christianity itself. The primitive Christians, and those of the Middle Ages, rarely forgot to erect them. I have seen inscriptions on tombstones bearing date 1340 and 1370 in parts of Ireland. There were a few in the county Galway, of the twelfth century. About forty-five years ago there were to be seen at Kilconnel Abbey, (near historic Aughrim) and in old graveyard at Ballydonnellan, also in the same county, the shattered remains of stones bearing date 1220 and 1272. In England I examined many inscriptions and found some more ancient still. In a venerable-looking cemetery in Leicestershire, in the year 1840, I saw a dilapidated stone; the characters were very nearly defaced; but I wet my handkerchief in the stream at hand, and, after a fashion, restored the letters of the rustic artist who was then, perhaps, some 650 years sleeping near the shade of a neighboring yew tree, through whose green drapery the sad, melancholy moan of the autumnal blast, could not disturb his long, quiet rest. The following is the substance of the inscription, for the spelling, style, &c., was of a very quaint order indeed:—

Companions of Childood! Friends of Youth! Strangers! as you journey on this way, I ask you for the love you bear the holy Virgin Mother, to remember in your prayers her whom the village once called the innocent, the beloved, and the beautiful Mary Bede. Her gentle limbs rest here until the Resurrection. A.D. May, 1240.

Many relics of antiquity associated with the dead have been rescued from the hands of the modern Goths and Vandals, by the learned Dean of Clonmacnoise (Dr. Butler), who takes a deep interest in the topography of the ivy-clad ruins of the ancient abbeys which are to be found in Meath. The venerable Dean is known to almost every antiquarian of distinction in Great Britain.

The old burial customs of the Irish were marked by many singular features; likewise those of the Anglo-Saxons, Normans, &c. The entrance into most churches was either at the west end or the south side. Persons buried at the north side escaped the notice of their friends; and, as alleged, were often forgotten in their orisons at church. The "north side" consequently became a condemned spot; and in time none save those guilty of some very grave offence, were buried there: lunatics, who had destroyed themselves, were buried at this side, and sometimes out of the east and west directions of other graves. It is said to be alluded to in "Hamlet," where the philosophic Dane bids the grave-digger cut Ophelia's grave straight. The same was observed with respect to persons who were executed.

If I can judge by the style in which monumental inscriptions in public cemeteries are executed at the present day—particularly in Ireland few of them will be legible in seventy or eighty years hence. Many of them that were chiselled some 25 years ago, are actually fading now. I have inquired as to the cause, but have not received a satisfactory reply. Some attribute it to the quality of the stone used. I have found the cutting in marble to be much after the same fashion. What is the cause?

REMARKABLE ESCAPE OF FRENCH POLITICAL PRISONERS.

In a recent article on the penal Colony of Guyana, the Moniteur stated that several political prisoners had found means to escape, but it gave no details. A private letter brings some particulars on the subject of considerable interest. At the beginning of this year several political transports, confined in the Devil's Island, conceived the idea of escaping. They cut down some trees and built a schooner; but, owing to an accident in launching, the schooner struck and went to pieces. Nothing daunted, they set to work again, and with such planks of the schooner as they were able to pick out of the water, and the stump of a large tree which floated down the Amazon River, they constructed a raft, on which, on the 7th of August last, seven men embarked in search of liberty. For four whole days they floated nearly at random on the sea, and at the end of that time, when their slender stock of provisions was entirely exhausted, their raft went ashore on a mud-bank.

Two of the party—one an Italian named Planori, and another a Pole named Bogenski—left the boat and waded along in the mud, hoping to find a habitation. They were so weak that they soon found themselves unable to draw their legs out of the heavy soil, and their companions learned some days later that their dead bodies, half devoured by crabs, had been seen by a native. The five who had remained on the raft, finding that their companions did not return, and being convinced of the hopelessness of looking for them, resolved to put to sea again. But to do this, it was necessary to construct another raft, it being impossible to get the old one off the mud. For an entire week they floated up and down along the coast upon such pieces of wood as they had been able to detach from the raft, and during all this time they had nothing to eat but raw crabs, and nothing to drink but salt water. At length they were fortunate enough to find a house, where they received succor. The names of these five men were Guerard, Bouguel, Carpezal, Chabaire, and Babin de Candre, of the Department of the Indre and the Loire.

A fortnight after their departure from the Devil's Island, the other prisoners then learned the issue of an enterprise which it might have been thought utter madness to undertake. A burning desire to risk their lives in a like manner for their liberty, ran through the colony. With the help of Government timber collected for building purposes, they found means to construct rafts, each capable of holding twenty men. Saturday, the 13th of September, was chosen for the departure of the expedition—Saturday being the day on which a week's provisions were served out to the prisoners. Thirty-four men in all got away on board the rafts. On the first raft were Messieurs Pordaye, de Tours, Bijon, Chauvin, Attibert, Gueren, Caillet, Devau, Salem, Carrieri, Dime, Boudon, Jeanfrais, Pan Herrey, Montfalcon, Scronde, Paul, Bivart, Meunier, and Dessalie. On the other were M.M. Frouin, Gueguard, Tourmace, Desbole, Trisson, Aisans, Icar, Bouselle, Dunaux, Vivant, Bonassieux, Bardiget, Angeliaume and Mauvian.

The weather was stormy for two days. On the 16th it became fine, but the night following was frightful. On the morning of the 17th, however, the twenty men on the first raft landed on a Dutch possession, inhabited by natives, who gave them so bad a reception, that they resolved at once to start into the interior of the country on foot. After a painful march of several hours, they slept in a wood, where they suffered greatly from insects; and the next day, finding no place of rest, they could think of nothing better than making their way back to their raft; but they found that the natives had taken away the sail, and being therefore unable to proceed to sea, they were too glad to pass the night in an empty hut. On the 18th the natives took them to the commandant of the Dutch Tibron Company, who received them very kindly, and gave them a boat, with a letter to some natives, ordering them to conduct the party to Paramaribo.

They left on the 20th, and on the 27th landed safely at Paramaribo, the capital of the Dutch Guyana—a town of twenty thousand inhabitants, situated about four hundred kilometers northwest of Cayenne, and nine kilometers from the sea. There they were kindly treated by the authorities, and were as surprised as delighted to find their five friends who were the first to escape from the Devil's Island. The other fourteen men on the second raft also arrived at Paramaribo on the 20th. The Dutch authorities, not knowing whether they were ordinary convicts or political convicts, thought right to keep them in prison, where they were up to Sept. 30, but they were to be released two days later.

Answers to Correspondents.

We have to complain of some of our Irish exchanges for making wholesale appropriations of original matter from our columns, without the slightest acknowledgment. The Waterford Chronicle has been, week after week, with the coolest and most systematic piracy, transferring to its pages THE FORTUNES OF CASEMENT O'REILLY, utterly ignoring the source from which it was derived. We do not like to complain of our old fellow-citizens; but we must, nevertheless, expose such premeditated pilfering.

THE DELIGHTS OF FINN MACCUMHAL.

FROM OSSIAN.

[Translated by Michael Doheny.]

To Mac-Cumhal, fair formed, it gave rarest delight
To be lulled by the waters of Essro by night,
And to list to Drumderg's rushing rivulet's song,
And to hunt under mists the green valleys along.

And the black-birds sweet warbling in Carna's oak-screen,
And the red-deer, love-lowing afar in Moyneen,
And the billows of Rory, when lashing the strand,
And the fawns as they danced o'er the bard hallowed land.

And the hunting-shout loud on the lofty Galtees,
And the gull's low complaint on the chill winter breeze,
And the love notes of hinds on the far Knockmeildown,
And the raven on battle-field, poised to sweep down.

And the white swans' descent, and barks dashing their waves,
And the clashing in battle of warrior's glaives,
And Bran, hot on the scent of a wolf, by his side,
And the rills from the mists that Slieve Mis' summits hide.

And the shrill shout of Oscar, on starting the game,
And the hounds in full cry through the vale as they came—
And to sit among Sages as evening declined—
'Twas enjoyments like these that absorbed the King's mind.

And delightful to Oscar, the clashing of spears,
And delightful the first note of battle he hears,
And delightful the crash of the foe when he yields,
And he hot in pursuit o'er incarnadined fields.

"Irish News Guard." Yes; the Band which escorted the military to Mr. Meagher's Lecture, last week, was generously supplied, gratis, by its liberal and patriotic manager. It is known as Shelton's Band, but is at present under the able direction of Mr. Oliver Dewey. Moreover, we have to inform you, that the occasion you refer to was not at all the sole one on which he gracefully accorded a like generous and charitable aid. He deserves well that the entire Irish-American contingent of our militia, in this and the adjoining cities, should on every opportunity cordially reciprocate those favors.

Thomas Fitzgerald, Lynn, Mass.—We have not received your renewed subscription. Mr. C. Doorly never had, or never shall have, any authority delegated to him to act as our Agent. Those who forward their subscriptions through him, do it at their own risk. Our Agents—as you must have seen it repeatedly announced in the Irish News—are always provided with a written authority from Mr. Meagher—over his own signature.

S. Chicago.—There are about four hundred pages of O'Mahony's translation of Keating stereotyped—it will be ready about Christmas. The delay will be more than compensated for by the additional matter given—the notes already inserted, being more than was originally intended for the whole work.

Maurice Walsh.—Your elaborate notice of the Testimonial and Dinner to be presented to Mr. Michael Barry, at Mrs. Luby's Academy, 275 Bleecker-street, on the 9th instant, was unavoidably held over until this week.

New-Haven.—Miss Teresa Esmonde will give a "Reading," from the American and Irish Poets, in your city, on the 11th inst., at Brewster's Hall.

Mr. Savage is much obliged by the information communicated by Mr. F. McNally, Pine Bluffs, Arkansas. It will be used in a future edition.

☞ Parties who receive the NEWS in a white cover, will please regard it as an intimation that their subscription has expired, and do us the favor of an immediate renewal.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1856.

JOHN MITCHEL—AN APOLOGY.

We devote a large space this week to Mr. Mitchel's lecture. The reading of it will prove a very wholesome duty. It is thoroughly refreshing now-a-days,—when ponderous platitudes are exhibited as "Philosophy" in one portion of "our leading journals," and barking irresponsibility "crowds out" common sense and common decency from the uncommonly cunning, and flippantly discourteous editorial columns of the other—when strong-minded women and weak-hearted men conspicuously attract the public gaze—it is we say, at such a time, peculiarly refreshing to listen to the strong words of an honest, clear-thinking, single-minded man like John Mitchel.

As Mr. Mitchel's theme was European Politics, and as he took particular and early care to state that when he used the word "Republican," he made no reference to any American party, we may (probably) be entitled to an especial liberty in referring to it.

Mr. Mitchel grapples with the European question—Poverty vs. Power—with that capacity for which he is so exceedingly remarkable. "Europe" is the skeleton of his discourse, Ireland is the heart. There is a trenchant sarcasm and an analytic comprehensiveness in it which, at the same breath, subdues us with the power of the despotism so vividly depicted, and animates us with the scorn and hopeful vitality which equally animates the lecturer.

It gives us a fraternal pleasure to read in the papers of Mr. Mitchel's success. He was interrupted by applause at the utterance of almost every sentence in St. Louis, and was given a public dinner. A man so popular, of course, was as good as a bank to the local newspapers. They talked about him, they reported him column after column—they took his life—that is, one of them at least, on its own statement, made a memoir of him.

This one was the Leader, edited by Dr. Huntington, who is well known as an enthusiastic convert to Catholicism, as a novelist of undisputed talent, though of somewhat equivocal taste, and, lastly, as a journalist, who writes a paper much better than he edits it. Altogether Dr. J. V. C. Huntington is an able, high-spirited, and so far as his paper and published acts evidence to us, a right honestly inclined man. His paper, aspiring to be popular, very naturally undertook to talk largely of Mr. Mitchel. We have not seen the biography below alluded to, but we have seen a paragraph copied into the N. Y. Herald, and accredited to the Leader, which was much of a pattern with some of the nonsensical stuff with which some New-York dailies offend the patience and good-nature of their readers. From the allusions in the article quoted below, a reader can glean sufficient to make the apology thoroughly comprehensible, and to exhibit its author as a man above conscious misrepresentation as above fear. We quote Dr. Huntington's article (of the 20th Nov.) entire, and think it unnecessary (now at least) to refer more particularly to the fact in support of which it was written:

We learn with regret that a passage in our biographical notice of Mr. Mitchel, on Saturday, has led some of our friends here to the inference that he was chargeable, in our opinion, with some deviation from honor in the surrender of his parole. Mr. Mitchel himself has also felt wounded by such a supposition. The wound is perhaps greater as inflicted by one who, while differing widely from his sentiments, admires his genius and sympathises with his misfortunes. As this fact has been communicated to us in a form to which the most sensitive honor can take no exception, it gives us sincere pleasure to say that our article is misinterpreted. If, especially, as we understand is the case, the officers to whom Mr. Mitchel surrendered his parole, would have been justified in shooting him down instantly, so that he incurred the risk of life, it may well be conceded that he gave them all the advantage which he was bound in honor to give. O'Brien, whom every one allows to be the soul of honor, sanctioned Mitchel's course beforehand, and publicly approved of it afterwards; this ought to be conclusive. Mitchel, in fact,—we have no hesitation in saying it frankly—is the person among the Young Irelanders for whom we have the greatest admiration. He has more genius than all of them put together; he has shown more candor and moral courage than most of them; he has probably gained as little by his revolutionary career, and lost as much as any, except Smith O'Brien; and we are pleased to think that such a man, with capacities for nobler things than hopeless revolutions, has no stain upon his course which, in the country of his adoption, would impede an honorable and useful career.

THE BOGUS BRITISH FLEET.

The presumed invincibility of England by sea and land, has been long the bugbear of the old nations of Europe. The lesson taught by America in this connection, seemed to be partially forgotten. The victories of Lake Erie, of Fayal, and the sweeping of the seas by Paul Jones, did not sufficiently open the eyes of the cowed monarchies, or remove the impression made at the Nile and Trafalgar. The victor of Waterloo was worshipped after the hero of Saratoga had modestly retired into his republican seclusion. With the ultimate evacuation of America by the British, the triumph of New-Orleans gradually ceased to be the theme of national rejoicing. The banners of England were illumed by the light reflected from former victories. She grew fat upon her conquests and invincible upon the reputation of generals and soldiers who had passed for ever from the battle-field. But it was a false prestige—a fraudulent pretense of strength that enabled her to sway the councils of her neighbors and mould the diplomacy of the great nations of the continent after the Anglo-Saxon idea. The last war, however, has laid bare her weakness, and driven her from that bad eminence whence she exercised so disastrous an influence upon the struggling nationalities that were led to regard her as the arbitress of their destinies. As a military power, she has ceased to hold even a secondary place among the nations. Her army is inadequate to the protection of her own shores, in the event of a general war, and her navy has at length been stripped of its terrors—not by a disastrous conflict on the high seas, nor a shameful flight from an enemy—not by its signal repulse by the forts at Sebastopol, nor its impotent demonstration before Sweaborg—but by the frank admission of that brave, burly outspoken old tar, Admiral Napier. He recently made a speech at Southwark, and devoutly returned thanks to Providence, through whose mercy he was not captured by the Russian fleet in the Baltic. In the course of his remarks he repeated the following conversation between himself and the Archduke Constantine:—"'Will you allow me', I said, 'to speak plainly to you? Why did you not come out to meet us at Kiel? We were then badly manned and badly disciplined. If you had come out, I don't know what the consequences would have been.' 'Ah!' said the Grand Duke, 'if I had screws I should have come out to meet you. I did not know that you were so badly manned until it was too late.' And I think, added the gallant Admiral, that it was lucky he did'nt come." The brave old Admiral had ships enough, but they were inadequately manned. Old land lubbers had been drafted from all the Coast Guard Stations in the three kingdoms, and placed aboard the fleet. The great majority of these men were superannuated fishermen, who had never seen a gun fired, and were totally unfit for maritime warfare. The fleets of England were bogus displays, bogus in the Baltic and Black Sea, and would have been captured by the first broadside of an enemy. Even the London Times, the great Anglo-Saxon bully, that has been impudently thrusting English supremacy into the face of this young and vigorous republic, admits the utter inefficiency and feeble condition of the English navy. It says:—"Thus we know what we might have expected had a fleet of old lumbering vessels, manned by the least maritime of all nations, come out to meet the splendid armament of the people who call their country the mistress of the seas. For the first time in history an English admiral with 20 sail of the line would have trembled at the sight of an enemy in the open sea." Truly, now that we know all, we may say, with Sir C. Napier, that it was "lucky the Russians did not come." Shall we have any more gasconade about "the mistress of the seas" from the English press, after this unmasking of her weakness—after this shameful hauling down of the flag that "braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze?"

POLAND AND IRELAND.

The Polish Democrats resident in New-York, celebrated the twenty-sixth anniversary of the breaking out of the Revolution of 1830–31, on the 29th November. The meeting was not so public as usual, but not less enthusiastic. The occasion was suggestive.

A great English Bard—Thomas Campbell—catches the ear of the world by lamenting the fall of Poland; and after the lapse of a generation, a greater Irish Bard, writing of the history and hopes of his own country, supplied the Poles with the War odes of a fresh Pan Slavic resurrection. They rushed to battle and immortality chanting the Irish melodies. The pathetic and passionate music to which Moore wedded the fervid eloquence of his imagination, but reflected the slumbering ire and the stubborn vitality of the heroes of the Forest of Elders—of the terribly glorious days of Bialolenka and Grochow. There was a congeniality of feudal strength, of fitful sorrow, of luminous grace, of valorous passion and woe between these Polish men and Celtic melodies which is truly significant of the inspiration and influences which suited them to each other. They were alike children of strength and sorrow, and when they ceased to be national, they ceased to live.

Between the Pole and the Irishman there ought to be a strong sympathy, if as is said, misfortunes make friends. Between Poland and Ireland, there are many historic parallels. The one as the other is in its present position by the domineering of the aristocracy and the relentless rivalry of "great houses." The Polish nobility as a class, is the most worthless, and debased order in Europe. Every attempt to place Polish nationality on a firm basis—to give it a healthy tone, has met with the contempt and scornful opposition of this party—and as there are within the boundary of what was Poland, little else but nobles and serfs, and as the latter are prohibited the use of arms, (as in Ireland) the opposition of the former was effective. This position of affairs naturally breeds political, religious and social dissensions which but more fully color the historic likeness of Poland and Ireland.

Both warlike, sympathetic and generous as a race, they have been fighting for men when they dreamed they were fighting for principles—have been butchered upholding a family, when they thought they were freeing a nation. But though these historical indices should refer the Pole and the Irishman into each others' arms, the history which Europe has been lately, and is enacting now, keeps them asunder. In the Russian War, the Pole hoped to find the realization of his hopes. So did the Irishman. With the Alliance—with England the Pole hoped for salvation. In the arm of the Russian the Irishman beheld the chastisement of England. The Pole went for vengeance. The Irishman went for vengeance—both for liberty; and, yet, neither dared love the other for fear of insulting the rude and heartless patrons which both were forced to adopt.

OPERATIONS OF THE INCUMBERED ESTATES ACT IN IRELAND.

The operations of the Incumbered Estates Act in Ireland have been extravagantly praised by all the journals of Great Britain. Old gray-headed staticians have framed formidable tables—tables of deep arithmetic lore—showing the net results of the land mart in Henrietta street. Philosophers in the profound science of political economy have written ponderous essays upon the constitutionally agrarian revolution which had quietty dispossessed so many of the landocracy of the country, and substituted for the ancient lords of the soil thrifty shop-keepers, retired tailors, English capitalists, and Scotch speculators. Lecturers of the old fogy stamp, from each of the three Queens Colleges, have been travelling over the kingdom, handling the subject with white kid gloves, and declaiming in pompous rhetoric upon the blessings vouchsafed the country by the wonderful facility established through the Incumbered Estates Act for the transfer of real property. But none of those parties have considered the effect this act has had upon the occupiers of the soil—upon the men whose toil and capital had made it valuable—who had drained the swamp and the marsh, cleared away the rocky surface, and made the barren mountain side fruitful as the Golden Vale. Those political economists only saw that several millions sterling had been brought, as they erroneously supposed, into circulation by means of this new land mart; but they forgot that a large portion of this money had been abstracted from other channels of circulation, and that with a change of proprietors there came also a change of occupiers—that the homesteads of the peasantry had been cleared away to make room for sheep-pens—that where the yellow harvest waved there is now but the browsing flocks and the solitary shepherd.

The whole land system in Ireland is wrong, for the tenant-at-will system leaves the farmer completely at the mercy of the landlord. Where there is not an independent yeomanry, holding their farms in perpetuity from the government of the country, there can be neither freedom nor prosperity. A free constitution on paper is quite a different thing from a free farmer, owning the produce of his own labor, subject only to fair tribute for such privilege. Such land tenure has not existed in Ireland from the days of her chiefs. Since foreign rule was established in the country, the soil of Ireland has been absolutely in the possession of a small number of English and Scotch adventurers, who exacted whatever rent they pleased from the inhabitants, and evicted them from their holdings whenever it suited their convenience. Levelled villages, and half depopulated estates, can yet be seen in every part of the country. From the mouth of the Shannon to the estuary of the Foyle—all along the wild and rugged coast of Clare, Galway, Mayo, Donegal and Derry, the blackened and roofless walls still mark the desolating progress of the exterminator. It was hoped that a change of proprietary would produce a change of policy, and that the new landlords would be more lenient to the old occupiers. Such is not the case. Evictions are still ruthlessly carried on in Ireland. The action of the Incumbered Estates Court has merely produced a change of masters. A horde of griping Shylocks have taken possession of a large portion of the Irish soil. They are generally an avaricious and utterly inhuman pack, who, sustained by British law, immediately commence to clear every human being from their newly-acquired domains. The old custom of tenant-right is ignored, old ties are rudely broken, and the wholesale eviction of the people is promptly executed.

It has been ascertained that four-fifths of the evictions have recently occurred on lands purchased in the Incumbered Estates Court. The respectable farmer sinks into a daily laborer, becomes the inmate of a poor-house, or a homeless outcast in the crowded hold of some emigrant vessel, to seek bread in a strange land. From the facilities afforded by the Incumbered Estates Act for eviction, the dispersion of the brave, genial, loving old race, who have passed through the persecutions of the penal days—through days of pestilence, famine and of war—is being rapidly accomplished. Property, sold for £18,299,350 14s. 9d., has already changed owners. If four-fifths of the evictions, as Irish journals confidently assert, have taken place on the purchased lands, the Incumbered Estates Act must have been to the peasantry a fearful engine of destruction, and to the country a curse instead of a blessing, for,

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

THINGS IN CALIFORNIA.

DEMOCRACY TRIUMPHANT.

The Democratic standard has been bravely defended and gallantly borne to victory by the citizens who have initiated a mighty empire on the golden shores of the Pacific. Representing, as it does, more than any other State, the characteristics of the United States, California has nobly stood by the honor and integrity of the Union.

The last steamer brought us the allegiance of the Californians to those principles of Democratic majesty under the auspices of which their cradles, in every village of the vast Republic, were blessed with the influences that Truth, Justice and Success inspire. The Democratic victory has been complete, and the opposition writers lament that though there are twenty-five thousand voters in California, from anti-democratic districts, in the north and east, they could not be influenced to vote against Buchanan. In no single county heard from has Col. Fremont a majority.

As was general over the Republic—so was it in California—the success of the Democracy was ushered in by an unusual calmness and quiet on Election day. It was the conscious calmness of a great duty about to be performed. The papers congratulate the people of the Young State—so lately the prey of civil war—on the grand spectacle, the like of which—citizens turning out en masse, and without molestation or difficulty depositing the ballots upon which the welfare of the Nation, to a great extent, depended—had never been witnessed before.

CELESTIAL ROWS.

A large portion of the news is taken up with the detail of a Chinese war, which was going to be carried on in one of the mining districts. It will furnish nutriment to the scribblers who deal in the mock-heroic. The dispute thus came about. A misunderstanding arose some time since between two rival mining companies, who are headed by two Chinese warriors bearing the euphonious names of Sam Yap and Yan Wo, about a mining claim situated on the Stanislaus River. In order to avoid the "law's delay" they agreed, says the Columbia Gazette, after much palaver, to meet in the lists, and with lance other weapons known to chivalry of old, in conjunction with a few of the improved "killers" of the present degenerate days, to wit, six-shooters, to settle the affair. The following highly celestial production is a translation of the pronunciamento of the aggressive party—the hereafter immortal Sam Yap's :—

Challenge of the Sam Yap Company, at Rock River Ranch, to the Yan Wo Company, at Chinese Camp.

There are a great many now existing in the world who ought to be exterminated. We, by this, give you a challenge, and inform you beforehand, that we are the strongest and you are too weak to oppose us. We can therefore wrest your claim or anything else from you, and give you notice that it is our intention to drive you away before us and make you ashamed of yourselves. You are nothing compared to us. We are durable as stone, but you are pliant as sponge. Your force would have no more effect against us than an egg would against a stone. You want to coax us to come to terms. That, we refuse. We mean to fight you, and expel you all from your localities. If you don't stand and fight us, we will consider you no better than so many brutes: and as such we will harness you to our own desires. There are plenty of us, well equipped, and ready, at any time, to meet and fight you whenever you choose; and would make you run into holes and hide yourselves. But we need not go to that trouble. We have only to speak, and you'll become affrighted. You won't stand like men; you are perfect worms; or like the dog that sits in the door and barks, but will go no further. If you won't accept the challenge, we tell you, by the way, to go and buy lots of flour, and paint your faces; then go in your houses, shut the doors, and hide yourselves, and we'll kill every man of you that we come across. Shame! Shame!

The Yan Wo's did not profit by the advice of the Sam Yaps. They continued to differ in opinion with the latter, and probably sent as scornful and warlike a missive back as that which threatened them with utter extermination. Pursuant to this state of celestial excitation a fight occurred near Mound Spring, on the Sonora road, about fifty miles from Stockton on the 25th of October. There was no general engagement, but several skirmishes took place, in which four men were killed and as many wounded. There were about two thousand five hundred combatants engaged on both sides, all armed and equipped. Many had firearms. A stop was put to hostilities by a Sheriff's posse, assisted by citizens. Some two hundred and fifty of the followers of Confucius were arrested, which put all the rest into confusion, and terminated, for the present, what promised to be a regular celestial row.

HERBERT—CRIME—MISCELLANEOUS.

This notorious individual had been again agitating public opinion. The San Francisco Bulletin, in an article on his departure for Washington, named him as a "Monte-dealer," "rowdy Congressman," "murderer," "double murderer," &c., and further states that Herbert had dogged the steps of the Editor of the Bulletin, to avenge the repeated attacks of that paper. Mr. Herbert in reply, issued an address to the People of the State, in which he calls on his opponents for the proofs to sustain their charges.

The arrest of a man named Bill Gristy, alias Bill White, one of the gang of bandits headed by the lately executed Tom Bell, has led to some remarkable revelations of extensive crime in the State, The prisoner gives the names of the gang, of the noted public places at which they stopped, details of many exciting scenes, and stipulated with his captors that, should his confession prove true, they were to use all their influence to procure his release.

Kennovan, an Irish pedestrian, has just completed the great feat of walking on twenty-four-foot plank 106 consecutive hours, without sleep or rest. Agriculture is extending and the prospects of the State generally are improving.

READINGS FROM THE POETS.

MISS TERESA ESMONDE.

Frequently have we been impressed with the conviction that, were there more public renditions of the productions of the best Poets, more certain would be the establishment in society, of an earnest appreciation of their works. There is a peculiar and thrilling charm in the reading of poetry, which, even to those unskilled in the Divine Art, produces an immediate and touching effect; while to the refined and intellectual mind, it is a treat of unequalled pleasure and gratification. Poetry—true poetry—delivered with correct conception and sincere feeling, creates, perhaps, the liveliest and most heart-stirring emotions that ever enter and pervade the breast of mankind. Like the floating air of approaching music, it steals upon the ear—reaching and subduing the heart at once, and, pouring throughout our entire being, plunges us into an infinite enchantment of delight—enthralling our senses—affording delicious calm—until, awaking from the spell, we are surprised and deeply grieved to find ourselves dragged from Paradise into the common-place and dreary sphere where, we regret to learn, our "local habitation" still exists.

The effect of poetical composition depends, chiefly, upon the correctness of the conception and delivery. There are poems in the language, the characteristics and attractions of which, it is extremely difficult to conceive;—certain it is, many require study to deliver. Those, however, who can feel poetry while reading it, certainly must they be preferred to those who simply "have it learned and conned by rote." There should be a visible heart in the deliverance, or the ear, so sensible to truth, receives unwillingly the text, and awaits in vain the feeling—to which every cord of the heart would thrill with responsive joy. To hear the noble impulses of our nature rendered sweetly—truthfully—full of affection and good will—is enough to cause even the most depraved heart to stand still, and ponder awhile o'er its tablet of memories, recalling many a dear scene of home and happiness, in other days, when the conscience was free from reproach, and a mother's knee held the head when the prayer was uttered.

When we believe commendation can be pronounced, because it is merited, we never fail to give it; and it is with a sincere and heartfelt pleasure that we mention the name of a lady justly entitled to the admiration of lovers of poetry. We allude to Miss Teresa Esmonde, whose "Readings" heretofore have been faithfully chronicled in our columns. There is a refreshing spirit and earnestness in her delivery, which is peculiarly grateful to the sensitive and appreciative heart. Her selections, moreover, are of a happy and judicious kind. The Harp of Erin is touched by her generous sympathy, and the genius of American verse remains at her side, remembered. As the Prisoner of Chillon welcomed the song of the bird which stole in upon the despair of his lonely heart—so, gladly, will her many admirers welcome the announcement of the "Readings of Miss Teresa Esmonde."

That a large assemblage of those who love poetry—poetry truthfully delivered—will greet her appearance on Monday next, we cannot for a moment doubt; and knowing, as we do, how well she merits their attention, we trust in being able to record "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

HURRAH FOR GALLANT WALKER.

(Air.—The Green Immortal Shamrock.)

It is the fate
With men a great
And noble end pursuing,
Their acts to find
A jealous mind
With evil wish construing;
Whose highest aim
Is to defame
The world's best benefactors—
Even Washington,
The purest son
Of Freedom, found detractors.
So doth Walker,
Unconquered Walker,— Noblest man
To fight or plan,
Is glorious, gallant Walker!

Among the first
Is England's worst,
With lies of foul invention,
Because she knows
He doth oppose
Her arrogant pretension.
Long may he rule,
With courage cool—
Men, and to victory lead 'em—
Success attend
The chosen friend,
Of universal Freedom!
Heaven speed Walker,
The noble hero Walker—
Foremost man,
To fight or plan—
Hurrah! for gallant Walker!

PHILA. GARRYOWEN.

COMING LECTURES.

We have perused, with intense pleasure, Richard O'Gorman's brilliant lecture—on "The Days of Chivalry"—prepared for the Catholic Library Association, and to be delivered before them at the Tabernacle, on Thursday, the 4th inst. Those who will hear him deliver it, can't fail to derive the utmost pleasure and instruction.

Thomas Francis Meagher will deliver a lecture at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday, the 9th of December, upon "Royalty and Republicanism—Europe and America."

John Mitchel will lecture in the Tabernacle, on Thursday, the 11th of December.

Colonel Doheny will deliver a Lecture at the Tabernacle Monday, December 21st, on the Rock of Cashel, its legends and its history, its poets and its kings. The subject is full of deep interest, and will be elaborately and eloquently treated by the distinguished lecturer.

LAMARTINE'S CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

MEMOIRS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS. By ALPHONSE DE LAMARTINE. Author of the "History of the Girondists," etc. Vol. III. Harper & Brothers.

With all Lamartine's obtrusive egotism, lackadasaical sentimentality, and political foolishness, it is impossible to read one of his works without pleasure. Not recognizing such a thing as responsibility in a historian, his writings devoted to "history" or biography are so effectively draped in the luxuriance of his fancy that they partake more of fiction than fact. He abhors dates, and aims only at the purpose of the painter and sculptor in concocting striking groups of men and women, and turbulent city scenes, with strongly-marked foregrounds and monumental perspectives.

He is a finished painter, but skilled more in what our artistic readers will understand as glazing, than in a bold reliance on his capacity to harmoniously use the original pigments. He is remarkable less for force than for finish; less for great depth of feeling than for superficial elegance of tone; less for breadth of light and shade than a dainty excellence of illustration, which is always attractive, if it fails to be impressive.

His style, though dangerously freighted with the flowers and fruits—the buds and blossoms of a romantically read and luxuriantly petted fancy, is nevertheless peculiarly popular. There is more poetry and romance in the masses than they get credit for; and of which no greater instance can be adduced than the power exercised over the multitude by the popular orators of every country. The phraseology of every great orator is romantic, embracing at once the suavity, the force, maybe the turbulence, but surely the esprit du corps of those he is addressing. Thus his power. As by his tongue he has expressed the feelings of the people, the people identify their heart with the one which has inspired the tongue to vindicate them.

Lamartine beautifies the truisms of the populace. He has no philosophy of his own. His mission is to make sentences, and he does that admirably. He, be it said, values and appreciates his mission. To him, the world is not; or at least is not much without Lamartine. He, in his own mind, has been a great necessity to the century.

Whether this third-rate planet will cease its perambulations when he shuffles off his mortal coil, or that he shall, by his last will and testament deposit us in some safe hands, is a question which we are wild enough not to care a continental—red cent about, however it may render sleepless the nights and irksome the days of the picturesque ex-President of the Provisional Government of 1848.

The present volume of his "Celebrated Characters," is a twin-brother of any other historico-biographic volume issued by the author. It has the same disregard for historical reference, and the same fascination of diction. It is alike remarkable for its poverty and its wealth. It is poor in original scope, but rich in treatment. It is full of beauties, clever antitheses, bright turns of expression, poetic appreciation, and a clearness remarkable when we consider the rhetorical affluence and prodigality of the author.

Of the five essays which compose the volume, those exhibiting French character—on Bossuet and Madame de Séveigné—have, evidently, demanded the most loving care of the author. The paper on Antar, the poet and prophet of the desert, the precursor of Mahommed is—what it aspires to be—a glowing reminiscence of Eastern travel and a study of Eastern poetry. That on William Tell is lyric and picturesque, and we think the most deliciatel written of the series. As for the article on Milton, it is a dreadful mutilation of fact, and a wretchedly French distortion of a strong, steady English republican. Either as a piece of history or a critical essay, it is ridiculous. There is scarcely a fact in Milton's life which has been recognised here by M. de Lamartine, and as for his appreciation of the poet of "Paradise Lost," it may be summed up in the Frenchman's own words, that the great epic is but "the dream of a Puritan who has fallen aleep over the first pages of his Bible."

After an extended discription of the Alps, the scenic grandeur of Switzerland, its wild beauty, its men and women, the oppression it labored beneath, and the noble peasant movement which initiated its freedom, the author concludes his bright and useful sketch in this poetic peroration:—

Happy are they who are thus identified with their country! Posterity seeks not to inquire minutely into their title to fame, but associates them with the greatness, the virtue, the durability of their race, and invokes blessings on them, down to their latest descendants. It is thus in the case of the unpretending pensant, William Tell: the simple honesty of his character bears a striking analogy to the primitive and pastoral people who commemorate forever his name and actions in their national traditions. His image, with those of his wife and children, are inseparably connected with the majestic, rural, and smiling landscapes of Helvetia, the modern Arcadia of Europe. As often as the traveler visits these peculiar regions; as often as the unconquered summits of Mont Blanc, St. Gothard, and the Righi, present themselves to his eyes in the vast firmament as the ever-enduring symbols of liberty; whenever the lake of the Four Cantons presents a vessel wavering on the blue surface of its waters; whenever the cascade bursts in thunder from the heights of the Splügen, and shivers itself upon the rocks like tyranny against true hearts; whenever the ruins of an Austrian fortress darken with the remains of frowning walls the round eminences of Uri or Glaris; and whenever a calm sunbeam gilds on the declivity of a village the green velvet of the meadows where the herds are feeding to the tinkling of bells and the echo of the Ranz des Vaches—so often the imagination traces in all these varied scenes the hat on the summit of the pole—the archer condemned to aim at the apple placed on the head of his own child—the mark hurled to the ground, transfixed by the unerring arrow—the father chained to the bottom of the boat, subduing night, the storm, and his own indignation, to save his executioner—and finally, the outraged husband, threatened with the loss of all he holds most dear, yielding to the impulse of nature, and in his turn striking the murderer with a death-blow. The artlessness of this history resembles a poem: it is a pastoral song in which a single drop of blood is mingled with the dew upon a leaf or a tuft of grass. Providence seems thus to delight in providing for every free commuuity, as the founder of their independence, a fabulous or actual hero, conformable to the local situation, manners, and character of each particular race. To a rustic, pastoral people like the Swiss, is given for their liberator a noble peasant; to a proud, aspiring race such as the Americans, an honest soldier. Two distinct symbols, standing erect by the cradles of the two modern liberties of the world, to personify their opposite natures: on the one hand Tell, with his arrow and the apple; on the other, Washington, with his sword and the law.

Of Madame de Seveigné, Lamartine is a great admirer. He purposely overlooks or barely hints at the heartless side of her nature, when she sneered at the famine stricken people of Burgundy. He devotes himself chiefly to exalt her character as a model mother; and recounts with tiresome eulogy and minuteness her feelings at having parted from her daughter. "No woman ever was so completely a mother," he exclaims, forgetting that this passion, which amounted almost to a madness, was in her peculiar case a mere concentration of a selfishness as remarkable as it has become historic. As to her capacity as a letter-writer, and the uses of her correspondence, Lamartine is redundantly appreciative.

The highest tribute of our author's allegiance to the genius and mission of Bossuet is summed up in the one word—Priest! "If," he says, "after having studied, in all their details, the actions, works, opinions, faults, virtues, style and language of so eminent a person as Bossuet, we desire to sum up in one word his general character, the word which presents itself to our mind as descriptive of the man is—Priest. The priest in all his majesty, his authority, his intellectual pride, could not be better represented than in the person of Bossuet!" To illustrate and expound this idea, Lamartine devotes over one hundred pages. He revels in twisting and unravelling the acts and eloquence of the great orator,

Lofty stature, an imposing atitude, collected features, refined action, a deeply-toned voice, regulated by the soul and not by art; a dignified bearing, derived as much from birth as from professional habitude, and a deep feeling of superiority—not as a man but as a medium selected to convey the Divine word to attentive hearers; and, finally, that indescribable confidence which the presentiment of future glory gives at the commencement of their career to the chosen band destined for immortality; such were the leading characteristics of Bossuet in the pulpit. The man was forgotton in the inspired missionary. The auditors felt that they were not listening to a measured discourse, but to a torrent of rushing eloquence. They retired more excited than charmed; they had no time to think of admiration, which the orator had no thought of producing. Of all the feelings of contempt which he felt for the world, none were more sincere than those he expressed for human approbation, and this sincerely quickened his natural eloquence: his words came from such a height that they crushed all in their descent, even the orator himself; hence it was that they carried such weight, and resounded so loudly when they fell.

The sermons of his hero—of which remain only notes and rough sketches— Lamartine characterises as "landmarks in space, between heaven and earth, by which to trace the windings and intricacies of inspiration."

Altogether the work will well repay perusal.

DEATH OF PAUL DELAROCHE.

The death of this eminent artist was annouced by a late mail from Europe. His loss to the art of which he was so grand a master, is one which cannot be estimated too highly, or too deeply deplored. His fame was not alone the property of France. It was European and American; the works which first initiated his success being founded on remarkable events and scenes from English history. He is well known here by engravings of these historical pictures; and his manner, to some extent, has been conveyed to New-York artists and critics by the exhibition at Goupil's of the original study of his famous "Hemicycle des Beaux Arts," and his "Marie Antoinette, before the Revolutionary Tribunal." A New-Yorker, Woodbury Langdon, Esq., is the possessor of Delaroche's "Napoleon at Fontainbleau."

A striking attribute of Delaroche's genius was its cosmopolitan grandeur. He did not look at every subject he illustrated with the eyes of a Frenchman; but thoroughly identified himself with the nationality he pictured. These works on English history are of such a nature as to make England rival France in sharing the glory springing from his pencil, and as zealous a care-taker of his reputation as if he were an Englishman.

An outline of the career of the great artist, may be summed up thus:

He was born in 1797. "His father was appraiser of works of art at the Mont-de-Piété, and encouraged his son's inclinations in the direction of art. The young Delaroche at first applied himself to the study of landscape, and afterward entered Gros's studio for the purpose of learning drawing. Gros was at that time the most celebrated of the dissentients from the school of David, but his pupil always observed a strict neutrality between the classic and romantic styles, and endeavored to create for himself a manner in harmony with the ideas and manners of his time. His first picture, 'Naphthali in the Desert,' he painted at the age of twenty-two, and it was exhibited in 1819, but excited little attention. From this period he went on constantly improving. In 1824 he produced his paintings of 'St. Vincent de Paul,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'St. Sebastian,' and in 1827, the 'Siege of Trocadero.' This last picture was an order on account of the civil list, and gained the artist the Cross of the Legion. About the same time appeared the 'Death of Queen Elizabeth,' a work which was much admired, and is now in the Luxembourg. Since 1831 the principal works which M. Delaroche has produced are, the 'Murder of the Children in the Tower,' 'Richelieu going up the Rhone,' 'The Death of Mazarin,' 'Cromwell contemplating the Body of Charles I,' 'The Execution of Lady Jane Grey,' 'Stafford going to Execution,' 'A Portrait of Napoleon, in the Uniform of the Grenadiers, walking in his Private Apartment at the Tuileries,' and a 'St. Cecilia.' Most of these works are well known to every one through engravings, and they are well distinguished by that variety of effect, exactness in detail, and careful execution, which are this painter's peculiar characteristics. But one of the most celebrated of his works is the decoration of the Circular hall in the Palais des Beaux-Arts, which he began in 1837, and was not completed until 1841. In this work, which is now in process of engraving, the painter has covered the wall with the illustrious artists of all ages, from Apelles and Phidias to Raphael, Poussin and Rembrandt, interspersed with a few allegorical figures representing ancient and modern art. 'Every one,' says a French critic, 'must be impressed with the grandeur of the work.' Among M. Delaroche's later works are the decoration of the Pantheon, and the painting by which he is best known in this country, 'Napoleon crossing the Alps,' and his 'Portrait of Napoleon,' mentioned above, which the artist was induced to exhibit in this country, in consequence of a copy having been exhibited as the original."

LIFE OF PRINCE TALLEYRAND, with extracts from his Speeches and Writings. By CHAS. K. MCHARG. C. Scribner.

This book must necessarily find its way to the bookshelves of all historical students, for strange as the announcement may appear, it is the only work yet published which conveys in a consecutive, historico-biographical manner, the career of that double-faced and single-minded wonder, yclept Talleyrand. Single-minded, in being all things for Talleyrand, Talleyrand was double-faced that he might the more powerfully contribute to the attainment of his single ambition—power. However largely he figures in the memoirs of his cotemporaries, and however effectively his intellect contributed to shed around Napoleon, by advice and pen-labor, much of that political sagacity and diplomatic decision which astonished the world, it is a remarkable fact and forcible commentary on human greatness, that until Mr. McHarg gathered the fragmentary and various memories of his great and strange and powerful career, no complete book-monument recorded the complete victories of the wily statesman and diplomatist. Mr. McHarg has executed his work well, and though from its nature we might desire somewhat more of detail, still, we must be thankful for what we have got. The style is clear, full, and even. We warrant the reader to be deeply interested from the first page to the last. The volume contains a very characteristic portrait of its hero when in the sere and yellow leaf.

THE INVITATION.

My lover brave has eyes of light
To cheer us through the trackless night;
His forehead stands in stormy seas,
Like sea-beat rocks of Hebrides.

My lover brave has eyes that hurl
The fire of scorn at knave and churl;
His foot is strong; and swift to save
As bird on wing from wave to wave.

Beneath gray rocks and castle walls,
Where o'er round stones the river falls—
In summer air—oh, happy day—
His blue eyes stole my heart away.

I'm sure he's near—my heart so burns;
A moment stay, till he returns:
By sunset, on the Lee below,
His little boat will swiftly row.

Oh, Mary, stay till he returns,
He'll sing you songs from Moore and Burns;
Your face will glow, your tears will start,
He'll stir the life-blood of your heart.

I'll show you then my secret mine—
His heart—a bed of gems divine;
He'll mould your brow in whitest clay,
And add you to his friends to-day.

Then, Mary, stay, and share to-night,
Our song, and dance, and wild delight;
Ten thousand welcomes ere we part
Shall greet you from his glowing heart.

SHINE BRADSTONE.

WHIP-POOR-WILL.

When twilight lingers on the hills,
And shadows haunt the dreamy vale,
While tired swains their teams release,
And at the frugal board regale,
Then perched on high, in leafy tent,
This bird proclaims the death of day:
Securely hid, he strikes the knell,
And until midnight tolls away!

Unseen amid the sombre leaves,
He never trills with hope of praise;
The stars gleam coldly on his path,
And song is all that cheers his days.
Amid the foliage zephyrs sigh,
The roses weep with pearly dew;
No tuneful throats his woes rehearse,
No gorgeous landscapes meet his view.

Yet, bird of night! thy plaintive voice
On Sorrow's cheek oft dries the tear,
While in the breast to virtue steeled
Remorse is roused with frantic fear.
Thou comest like an honest friend,
When shadows loom upon our path,
To cheer the soul whose yielding faith
Misdoubts escape from future wrath.

BELSHAZZAR.

Mr. E. M. Ward, has returned from Paris with a portfolio of sketches for the picture of Victoria at the tomb of Napoleon—commissioned by the Queen. Louis Napoleon and Eugene are to give the artist sittings in December.

JOHN MITCHEL ON EUROPEAN POLITICS.

Mr. Mitchel delivered a brilliant lecture at the Hall of the Mercantile Library, St. Louis, on Saturday evening, 22d ult. The St. Louis Republican—which reports the discourse very fully—states that the Hall was crowded by a large and intelligent audience. The delivering of the discourse occupied one hour and forty minutes.

He remarked that he was to solicit the attention of his audience this evening to the affairs of a distant portion of the world, to ask them to turn their minds away for a little space of time, from their own glorious land—the affairs of which, for the past six months, have been of more absorbing interest—to look with him across the sea. "Separated as we are by a world of water," said Washington, "from other countries, if we are wise, we shall surely observe those relations which Nature has appointed." Like every word that fell from the lips of Washington, that was wise and true; but the Atlantic is not one quarter the width that it was in Washington's day. There is no world of water now; the Atlantic is no barrier, but a beaten highway, whereon a Maury has almost set up finger-posts, and what is even a more impressive circumstance is this, when the telegraph wire is once finished to Newfoundland, a Board of Admiralty sitting at the War Office in London, can whisper the word of command to armies in this country in five minutes. Here are elements introduced that dry up the Atlantic almost. The movements of Europe are not only interesting to us, then, as the movements of the parent whence we all sprang, but for this reason, that they have come so close to us.

Republican Refugees are continually making appeals to American opinion in this day. In fact appeals are ever coming across the seas to America. Republican Refugees claiming and appealing to American sympathy, for the good cause, which they have left bleeding at home. What the views and expectations of these refugees are, he thought he ought to know, having in fact, the honor to be one of them himself.

But when he said Republican, it would perhaps be well to explain his meaning—for fear of mistake—for words change their meaning so fast now-a-days, in these times of party strife. When he said Republicanism, he did not mean Ethiopean or Black Republicanism. [Loud cheering.] On the other hand, the Monarchs of Europe have their agents at work, in a thousand channels, to conciliate the American people on their side and against their people. He need hardly observe that the most active in that direction, is the monarch of Great Britain. So that it may be assumed that there is the expectancy, that in the trouble of coming years, this Republic shall have some part to play—some word to say. The suffrages of the American people are courted, their influence, or at least, their sympathies, are wanted, on one side or the other. Now that the smoke of the American's own periodical family controversy is allayed, perhaps it might be as good a time as any to look across the sea, and see how it fares with our heavy laden brethren of Europe.

The prophecy is easy and delightful; it was not his province, but he would try to fall in with that current of prevailing sentiment, and depict the prospects and position of the European people, and this he would do as smoothly as he could. We all know that peace has been proclaimed in Paris, this very year, and this with illuminations and rejoicings perhaps more than enough. Now, has there been peace in Europe, or is there no peace? True, peace has been proclaimed; the semi-barbarian Russians, as we are diligently taught to believe, have been taught a lesson—they have received a check, land marks have been established in the nations, thus far shalt thou come and no farther. War—there is no war any longer; war is bound over to keep the peace. Bellona, a strong-minded female, has grown old, we are told, though she has not lost any of her teeth, and she has been put into bonds, she may go to the school-marm, in the school of human progress, and learn lessons of Antoinette Brown. [Laughter.] But more, we are called on to enjoy the gladness of the time. Justice is returning with her scales of justice. What more? Swords have been beaten into plough-shares. That is to say, that the guns and bayonets have been taken from the militia, and replaced in the Government armories, that they may not do harm in the hands of freemen.

THE STATE OF THE FUNDS.

Let him add what brilliant touches he could to the picture, and make it as bright as possible. The British funds are not down or up, but balancing themselves with considerable cunning on nothing. France glories in her newly established credit mobilier, in which a franc can represent ten thousand, as long as his Imperial Highness lends the credit. Not only so, but Crimean heroes also, are above par. Many a Mademoiselle of France and many an English maiden rejoices in her Crimean lover, though his sleeve hangs loose without an arm. Fortunate men, they, for they are the last to be wooed from the battle-field. Hereafter, among civilized nations, the suitor and the bridegroom shall have two arms, and be without cross, medal or star. Is this an exaggeration? Why, the treaty of Paris, by the third article, announces not peace only—peace is nothing—but the perpetual friendship of these powers, Russia, Austria, France, Prussia, and Sardinia. What an affectionate band of brothers they are! [Laughter.] Peace and perpetual friendship is absolutely between them, and if such be the case between the European Governments, who will refuse them joy? But as to the people, that is quite another matter, as he would presently show.

It must be remembered that throughout all these rejoicings and illuminations, through all the festivals and glories of royal christenings and coronations, men are all around to be found who persist in seeing no peace at all, but only a short armistice, who say that this inevitable war was not only not yet finished, but not begun; that the great game of the war was not yet made up,—the stakes not yet ascertained, the match not arranged, and partners not drawn. But the Emperor of France says the war is ended. Moreover, they said that the ruling elements had not begun to move at all, the men of the European Democracy. That the war, in short, had not yet been crowned with the revolution that has had its martyrs for forty years. It has only cast its shadow forth, this to come shall be the war, the other being but the semblance. That war which Princes, Prelates, Serene Highnesses and Millionaire Stockholders have not yet begun to believe in, but which every thinking man in Europe knows must burst out, and when it comes, Princes, Principalities, and Serene Highnesses must go down to perdition loaded with the heavy curses of the world. [Cheers.]

WHAT OTHERS THINK.

He knew that such prophets of war had arisen, and by all the organs of public opinion—he meant by this the organs of the dominant classes—they had been laughed at. It is the policy of these organs to deny it altogether, and what is strange, even here in America, so apt are we to take our opinion from the powers of Europe—even here in America, in this Republic of the United States—in this republic which exists by a revolution—that stands on a revolution—there is a disposition to the disbelief in the fact of revolution among the population of Europe. Americans are too apt to flatter themselves that they alone know how to win and wear liberty. He desired candor; let his audience take a look with him this day, at the actual condition of the European people. He said European people in contradistinction to the ruling classes, under Dukes and Serene Highnesses. Let them turn their eyes away from coronations and regal christenings, and consider how it fares with the farmer, the artisan, the mechanic—in short with the people who supply all that imperial pomp and power.

THE PEOPLE.

It is a fact, and let Americans realize it themselves if they could, that in all the German States, in Austria, throughout Italy and France, every farmer and artisan is under the surveillance of the police, not one of them can move from his known and registered place of residence, without passports, vises and countersigns. They must be passed by the police; the police must know where they sleep at night. And why is this precaution taken? Why, lest these men should be conveying communications between revolutionary societies—lest under pretext of looking for work, they should be carrying communications amongst secret organizations.

These societies are well known to exist. Societies of a revolutionary character are known to be spread to the very remotest quarters, and to be all in the posture of awaiting the moment to spring. They are in Northern Italy, covered as it is with Austrian troops and overspread with Austrian forts from end to end, where every traveler whatsoever, by railroad or otherwise, if in the opinion of the Austrian sentry or police, he smells of Young Italy, if his beard be cut in republican style, if they do not like the color of his hair, is liable to be dragged out, sometimes half a dozen times a day, and sent to prison or back whence he came, or wherever in their opinion the interests of society may require. In France, the paternal Emperor is obliged to make arrests nightly. In Southern Italy, which is governed by Bomba, he is obliged, though it hurts his heart, to govern his subjects with severity.

In England, liberal England. He (speaker) thought he almost heard some one of his hearers say, "What is he going to say of England?" [Immense applause.] What is there that this inveterate revolutionist is able to bring up of that land?—that land where Harriet Beecher Stowe lately assured her friend, the Earl of Harrington, there was nothing to prevent the absolute happiness of the humble people, except—what? Nothing but strong liquor. Indulgence in strong liquor—that is all that she sees to be mended. [Laughter and applause.] Now, as to England, he would not detain by generalities—he would not deal in general terms. England, also, is covered over with revolutionary societies. He would not remind his audience of the two hundred thousand able-bodied paupers living in their work-houses on public rates, but he would mention one or two facts of recent date, and from them such inferences as could be, might be drawn.

THE CRIME OF POVERTY.

He found in the Halifax Guardian, of October 6th last, a proceeding of a Board of Poor Law Guardians and magistrates. Five men, described as very respectable working men, out of employment, were brought up before these magistrates, charged with nothing in the world but with having no money, and with having applied at the workhouse the previous night for a night's shelter, which, by the way, was refused them. They were guilty of the crime of poverty. These five respectable working men out of employment, were committed to a felon's cell in the jail, and sent to hard labor; "for," said he "they are candidates for hard labor—they are looking for work—let them have it on the tread mill." [Cheers.] The report goes on to state that the innocent Mayor of Halifax remonstrated. "How is that," said the Mayor, who did not feel authorized to commit men to prison unless they had committed some offence. "But what is a man to do," quoted Mr. Farnham. "Why, they must go to jail." In vain some suggested on that occasion, that if they were turned from the door of the poor-house, they would fill up the jail, and and what advantage would it be. In vain they urged there would be no gain, inasmuch as they were still supported by the county, and men out of employment, would get in jail for a shelter, so that in this happy, prosperous country, there was a number of respectable laboring men out of employ, that are happy to get into jail to secure bread to eat.

But if he be fortunate enough to get into the workhouse, how was it? He (speaker) would give a fact. In the city of London, two of the richest parishes are St. Pancras and Mary-le-bone. They are two of the wealthiest parishes of London. Each has its Workhouse Bastile, and it has come out, by mere accident, that, in each, they are in the habit of flogging women—of keeping them in order by flogging—poor women, guilty of that unpardonable offence against the London Holy Ghost—poverty. [Loud applause.] A small publication has been got up since the revelation of this treatment, and it is sold by hundreds and thousands of copies, among the working classes: it is entitled "Dred, a tale of the Mary-le-bone Workhouse." In the style of the work, well-known under a similiar title, it asks, where is the Earl of Shaftsbury and the Duchess of Sutherland? Where are those men who keep audiences sobbing, as they detail the sufferings of the blacks of this country? Alas! for Mary and Sophia Elizabeth, for their names have become "familiar as household words," their skins are white. Exeter Hall has no tears for them.

In short, to those familiar with the almost fabulous luxury of the upper classes, and who have heard of the hideous, obscene poverty of the lower classes it is apparent that, in England, as elsewhere in Europe, monarchs are balancing themselves unsteadily over an abyss of revolution.

PRETENSE VS. REALITY.

The great powers are pretending to be busying themselves at this moment about fixing the proprietorship of the Isle of Serpents, and settling the boundary of Bessarabia, but any one knows they are preparing against the day opened in 1848—a day coming swiftly and surely. That day when the Domocracy, surging beneath the throne, shall rush out once more—when real war shall lift its head again from Palermo to Dublin, when Berlin, London, Paris, Vienna, and all the great capitals, shall once more roll and shake like the ship in the trough of the raging sea.

It has been said that the day of revolution is over in England. Oh, no! It is only beginning. That feudal sort of arrangement that has lasted so long, is worn out at last; it has become scandalous before God and man; society is all sick, and surely waiting till the old worn-out garment is removed and pinned down by bonds. A man, no radical demagogue and no Chartists, has cast the horoscope for him; he says the speaking classes will speak, and their voice must produce the earthquake. He would entreat his audience to believe that those two hundred million people cannot go on, weltering forever, in the cellars; they cannot be forever driven back by the bayonet, although they have been so long crushed. Every man that has risen up has been triumphantly got rid of, silenced or bought over with the people's money to desert the people, or if that bargain could not be negotiated, he has been pinned down in a dungeon, or shipped off to the uttermost end of the earth. [Loud applause.] Some of those men who have thus perished, were the best men that these countries have produced, and he (the speaker) did not fear to say the loftiest intellects and the most loving natures were they who sunk extinguished in dungeons under ground, or who withered away in the jails of Venice, where in cells below the Adriatic an Austrian Chief-Governor could, by opening the flood-gates, cool his seditious felony up to his neck in water, or when in the open dungeons of Italy they could roast him to death by the radiated heat of the sun, or who had sunk under the tortures of Cayenne. So from hour to hour they die. Young men becoming prematurely bald, gray, wrinkled, decrepid or idiotic. So old men joyfully mounted the scaffold to save themselves from worse than death. Does any one believe all that devotion has been in vain? Has the Maker made the choicest of His creatures only for that—to die as dogs die? Have they been gifted with God-like brains that they may be run into madness forever? Is this for nothing? Have they had kindled in their souls an endless detestation for falsehood, meanness and tyranny, only that the false and mean tyrants of the earth should trample them under foot? Has he poured into them that rich blood only that it should be shed upon the barren earth and bear no fruit? No! Believe the universe not built on that principle, and he would give three reasons, which, to his mind, are satisfactory proofs of disbelieving that the cause for which these men lived and died had vitality.

SIGNS OF VITALITY.

First. Because the life and death of these men has not been taken as a warning, but as an example, to the choicest youth in Europe. The question is not how to avoid the sad fate, but which of us is worthy to follow in the footsteps of these men. Maranchelli comes from his dungeon after many years of confinement; and behold the report of him produces more sedition and more seditionists than can be put in Austrian jails.

Smith O'Brien [Immense cheering.] He though the audience might well cheer at hearing mention of that noble name. [Cheers.] O'Brien, after six years of ignominious bondage, embittered by cruelties that Austrian and Neapolitan will have to study to come up to, comes home not as a felon, but with head high and with defiance on his lips, and he braves them in all their power, and at this moment no man is so universally revered as he. This being the case, he had no fear of the revolutionary spirit dying out.

Secondly, It is perfectly within the remembrance of all in Europe—it could not well be forgotten, for it is but eight years ago—how easy a King or crowned Duke is frightened and driven over the world without his even waiting to pack up his portmanteau. The extreme facility with which this kind of game is started, hunted and driven to tree, is another ground from which he concludes the game of King-hunting is not yet entirely given up. [cheers.]

The third reason is, that men in those western countries of Europe have not yet become so very chary of their lives or their blood, so much afraid of being killed, that the reigning dynasties can hope to keep them intimidated by the mere force of the bayonet forever. These men are America's own kinsmen—cousins. It may be possible to divert them for a time by spectacles, but frighten them no one ever can. They know that Paris is fortified, that Madrid is to be so, and that Dublin is being filled with armed bands; they know that, they see it all, but they know also that on a certain bright morning in '48, King Louis Phillippe, the richest, strongest, wisest tyrant in Europe, the once courted of all, after ten years spent in surrounding himself with ten thousand men, fought in the nest he had built for himself, one hour and a half, and threw them the crown, without the head, and then fled. [Cheers.] Yes, it is impossible to keep these Parisians forever under the influence of fear. He would remark that no day dawns on Paris, that that day does not rise on fifty thousand men at least, who are perfectly ready to go forward and raise up barricades, singing their merry songs as they do the work before them. We may conclude that Mourir pour la Patrie is not yet banished forever. That imperial ditty, Partant pour la Syrie, has not yet driven away the souls of men accustomed to tramp through palaces to the stormy music of the Marseillaise. [Loud applause.]

This is so in his own country and in Southern Italy, but enough he had said to show that without revolution it was to enact the play of Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark.

PEACEFUL SIGNS.

But suppose no revolution is brewing at all—that all the monarchs of Europe stood staunch at home—looking at the state of affairs that they have the impudence to call peace in Europe.

First, there are four million of bayonets—nearly four millions of troops armed in Europe after disbanding the militia, to keep the peace. Americans would not call that peace.

Next, in Turkey, the original occasion of the late war, there has been continual civil war since her protectors took her ailments under consideration. Take one other fact. The Peace Commissioners were sitting in Paris, consummating their blessed work of securing justice and civilization, asserting the rights of the weak against the strong, when on the part of Sardinia enters Count Cavour; he memoralizes the commission, on the part of his master, that neither justice nor civilization can ever begin to trive in Northern Italy, while the Austrian military oppress the people; that the Austrians are raising up the spirit of young Italy. Foolish Count, to appeal to England for liberty, or to France for justice, for Austria is strong; she has three hundred thusand men, and she is fresh, for she has not been torn by battle. It is inconvenient to bully Austria, and it is concluded, that the thing to do good to young Italy is not liberal institutions but Austrian dungeons, and lead taken inwardly. [Laughter and applause.]

THE BIG BULLY.

England then finds it inconvenient to begln to bully Austria, but, in order to bully somebody, she turns on the King of Oude. She makes short work of him, she swallows King and Kingdom, and that, too, without any of his own favorite sauce. She then turns to America, makes—well, she makes demonstrations in the West Indies and in Canada, sends ships, and troops, and military stores to Halifax—reviews at Spithead, with great pomp, her thundering fleet—and she improves the occasion, through her Ministerial organs, to read a homily, to give warning to any nation that may happen to have an expansive seaboard.

Singular to say, in the middle of these demonstrations, her Ambassador is sent home in disgrace from Washington. [Cheers.] Sent home, not, I am proud to say, while her hands are full of the Russian war, but when she had put that to an end for the present—when she had not had enough of fighting—just when her men were fuming with vexation at that work cut too short—while her hand is uplifted, and her voice is raised to frighten, her Ambassador is sent home with such ignominy as never before. [Applause.] What does she do? Send home Mr. Dallas? Declare war? No; my Lord Palmerston takes a very decided measure, indeed, and dubs the disgraced Ambassador Knight of the Bath; it ought to be Knight of the Horse-pond. [Loud cheers.] America proves intractable—hard to bully; so Lord Palmerston looks around, like a true bully as he is, to see who is weak, and who has got no friends. [Laughter.] Greece is taken care of by France, so that, in looking over the map of Europe, Palmerston sees no fairer game than Ferdinand of Naples. Now, Ferdinand is compelled to rule his subjects with a great deal of severity; he shuts up many of them in dismal dungeons, without charges being preferred against them, or trials granted. He has banished a good many of them, like the rest of Kings, to foreign countries. In all this, he imitates feebly—he follows the example of England and France; but, just at this moment Lords Clarendon and Palmerston feel scandalised at his unconstitutional mode of governing, and the Emperor of France is feeble in health, and his nerves cannot bear it. A squadron is sent to sea.

BOMBA A READER OF HISTORY.

King Ferdinand calmly concentrates his troops, mans his forts, shots his guns, and tells these philanthroic powers to mind their own business. [Immense applause.] Now, King Ferdinand is even so ill-bred as to make the hardest annunciations—he alludes to India and to Ireland. He has read the newspapers, he has read history, he knows the story of 1848 in Ireland. He knows that when the Queen of England thought she was surrounded by some revolutionary movements, she suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, and seized hundreds and thousands of men and shut them up, and never brought them to trial to this time. King Ferdinand knows this, and he retorts on Lord Palmerston with great effect. But he has read also how England, with its liberal and enlightened government, has a system by which it can rid itself of two millions and upwards of its enemies by an artificial famine, and indeed he envies them the secret. Indeed, he (the speaker) believed no despotic Government on earth ever conceived such a foul system, and, perhaps, if King Ferdinand knew the way, he would try it, but he was willing to believe he would not. King Bomba has also read how England is obliged to have recourse to torture in India to collect her taxes. He knows of no familiar of the Inquisition in the world who ever knew how to torture a man's body for the saving of his soul so cunningly as British officers can tear and sear the India farmer. So he says, take your own harpy claws off Ireland, rule India with less savage barbarity, and then I may perhaps listen to you.

He dwelt so long on this, not only to show the kind of spirit which Byron declared was the primum mobile of English society, but to show the complication of European affairs.

SAUCE FOR THE GOOSE, &c.

It is well remembered how Russia threatened Turkey about the Christian Greeks three years ago, and now England attempts the same thing, Russia comes in and says, abide by your own rule; do not presume to interfere with the rights of sovereign King Ferdinand; like case like rule, and if you attempt to fire one broadside into Naples you must prepare for war with me. [Cheers.] Now what to do in this contingency? The fleet was commissioned, the squadron had set sail, the ultimatum was drawn out. The fleet cruised out, they bore up toward and drifted to leeward, but they never went up to Naples. From the highest tower the King of Naples could not see even the top-sail of one of them. Not only that, but placards were stuck up on the walls of the city to this effect: Lost or strayed, somewhere in the Mediterranean, two good fleets; whoever signals them as being seen to the Minister, shall be rewarded. [Laughter.] But strange to say, at this moment a powerful Russian fleet sails into the Mediterranean merely to guard her trade and merchant shipping. And Spain at the same instant sent all her fleet into the same waters, but merely as a kind of maritime police. Sardinia, too, sees, what is going on, and Austria commissions her fleet to cruise in the Adriatic, hard by, but only for exercise. At the same time the American Consul at Naples thinks it just wise to make a requisition on the Commodore of his nation, that he had better be in the Bay of Naples, to be there too. Is it not strange that in one year after this peace these brothers should have to be watching over each other?

The truth is, the English have got up this measure to get hold of Sicily, but France has no idea of suffering England to take Sicily. Palmerston talks of his Italian intervention with a view to raise up an insurrection in Naples, then of crushing it and settling Bomba on his throne; and, lastly, of taking Sicily as the price. France sends to watch the English fleet, Austria to watch both, and Russia thinks they are all worth watching. What perpetual friendship!

But, in the meantime, while such is the state under which the Western Powers exist, England particularly presumes to have the right to interfere. Young Italy haunts them in their dreams!

In the meantime, while these things are going on in Italy, the peace is assuming an alarming aspect in the East. The frontier of Bessarabia has not begun to be settled yet, to say nothing of the Isle of Serpents. In fact, Lord Palmerston's organs complain of these barbarous Russians for giving Lord Clarendon false maps. These same barbarians who gave Lord Dundee false charts, and let some of his ships go ashore in water fabulously marked on charts as being twenty feet, and who extinguished all the lights of the lighthouses when Napier wanted to go up, remain barbarous. So that with such barbarians to deal with, it is impossible to say how soon the details of this tiresome peace will ever be settled. In the meantime, Turkey, poor Turkey, lies lost and powerless. It is no longer a sick man; the man is dead, dead as ever was, and shortly there will be a battle over his corpse.

CHRISTIANITY VS. BARBARISM.

But one slight advantage that has come to it is, that Turkey has got the reopening of the trade in the free-born white women of Circassia—the traffic in Christian slaves. While Russia predominated in that sea, the sale of the Circassians was stayed; Russia called the trade piracy,—contrabrand, and treated it so, to the great curtailment of Moslem life; but when the Christian Allies came into the Black Sea, as the champions of civilization and justice, when they shut up the Russian fleet in fortified harbors, the trade was re-opened with greater vigor than before. Such is one fruit of the intervention of the Western Powers between Turkey and Russia. Now, this opening of the traffic in white slaves has become notorious that the Bishop of Oxford, a member of the House of Lords and a son of William Wilberforce, of Abolition memory, this Bishop, after long pondering of the circumstances, thought that a decent respect for lawn sleeves and silk apron required that he should do something in the matter; that he should calmly, and in a Christian-like manner, advert to the circumstances in Parliament, so he mentioned it in Parliament. He was instantly satisfied by his noble friend, Lord Clarendon, by his being assured that the attention of Government was turned to that painful thing, and moreover, that Schamyl, the Circassian Chief, was opposed to it. The Bishop knew that all this was false—that Schamyl was not opposed to the trade—that he had warred against Russia for years to maintain it, but he was satisfied that he had done his duty, and he sat down with all the becoming satisfaction that a man feels who has done a good action, and the trade remained, and still remains, growing more horrible every day. And, since the day the Bishop so called the attention of Government to the fact, we find that the trade has been increasing to such an extent that the old stock of slaves had become utterly valueless, and murder has become more frequent in Constantinople. Every night sacks, with the mangled corpses of females, are thrown into the Bosphorus. He would read two sentences by English authors, relied on by the Bishop, to give some idea of what the trade is. One says that at present the only trade carried on in Constantinople is that in white women, and this seems to be extraordinary active at present. Another—and, to his credit be it said, he disproves of it—writes from Constantinople, regretting to see that the Slave-Trade is on the increase; every boat from the port of Abazia brings in ten or a dozen white Christian women for the market in Constantinople, while even the Austrian steamers do not refuse to bring cargoes of hundreds into port. Think of this British nation that is so filled with horror, righteous and virtuous horror, at the black Slave-Trade, that it sends out one fleet to stop the trade in blacks on the African coast, and sends another to open the traffic in white slaves. [Applause.]

What a profoundity of hypocrisy in that Bishop and all the rest of the bench of Bishops, to sit by in Parliament and help with their votes, and give by their votes all the sanction of religious association to all the abominations of English rule in East and West. So for Cabool, burned down, and so with Ireland, starved. Lo! unto you hypocrites, the gory soil of India will long cry out for vengeance on your hoary heads. Not a Circassian girl will float in a sack down the Bosphorus, strangled by the bow-string of her master, when he is tired of her beauty, but it will cling to your souls to curse you to perdition.

BRITAIN'S HOPES AND FEARS.

It is well-known that one main object of England, after justice and civilization of course, (laughter,) was to extend her influence in India, and to check that of Russia. With that view, both of these powers have been courting Persia, of course with the view in the end, he need hardly say, of swallowing her. Persia thinks of the two the least desirable friend is England; of the two she prefers Russia as a friend, and England for an enemy, and he believed her instinct was right. Just when the Peace Commissioners began to make all smooth in Turkey, intelligence came bursting in from the East that the Persians were on the way to an advanced post of India, and that Russia was building and manning a powerful navy in the Caspian Sea. England takes sudden alarm, a fleet is instantly sent to the Gulf of Persia with an ultimatum at the cannon's mouth. It is well known that no British force could march through Persia; long before they should reach Teheran they would meet the Russian bayonet, and what would become of them, with no French to preserve them, their allies so far off? (Applause and laughter.) So that it is clear the Russians will get leave to work their wicked way in Persia.

We find that the British power is not yet ashamed to boast of British justice and philantropy—not ashamed to turn round to America and revile her with the charge of intending to break a treaty. The ministerial organs pretend there is an intention to take Panama, and the Times refers to it. Think of it, to be shut off—God help us—from the diplomatic circle—to be held for Arabs and Gypsies—drawn off from civilized society, with whom it is impossible to be classified—to be stigmatized as a people bound by no compacts, respecting no law, dreaming of no justice, by whom? By the land tyrant of India the treaty breaker of the Carnatic, the fire burner of Cabool, (immense applause,) who makes allies to deceive them, and conquests only to rob? But whether or not, it seems America is out of the pale of society according to the Times newspaper. He thanked God there is one Government which can be said to be out of their pale, and he thought there was another Republic, the youngest Republic, whose President and Chief is WILLIAM WALKER. Immense cheering.

A SUMMING UP.

He had referred to the state of things in Italy; it is much the same in Spain, throughout Germany and Switzerland. These brothers who swear in this year to be eternal friends, are throughout Europe eyeing one another, and those cordial and friendly allies, England and France, are beginning to feel that their interests are not quite similar, that their feelings are not in harmony, and never were; that their temporary association for temporary purposes is at an end, and that the sooner the show is at an end the better. England wants Sicily, and France declares she shall not have it. The English papers are already holding up their pious hands in horror of the cruelties of the French Emperor towards his prisoners at Cayenne, which it would appear was only discovered some few weeks ago. The French Emperor retorts on this by pointing out the condition of Ireland, for that country is good to point a moral, and if we cannot wrest it from the grasp of the British Government, we can enjoy a smile at seeing it thrown in her teeth. What care they for the angry man—for the Bank of France with a deficit—what care they for placards posted at night and which are torn down—the police will care for that—what care those crowned heads? Is there not peace in Europe? Consider the coronation of Russia, is not that the very apotheosis of peace? He felt almost compelled to pity these figures married and given in marriage, dancing in an atmosphere light, and redolent with perfume, not knowing the moment when their dance may turn to the terrible sword-dance, with a bloody figure at the end of the hall, reflected in every mirror, advancing slowly, but steadily and surely, arrayed in bloody garments, with clanking chains, that points the finger to martyred sufferers, and on its forehead written the name "Revolution and Retribution." [Cheers.] He pretended to be no prophet; he could not say how long protocols would pass to and fro, but he could say that the elements of revolution were at work, and as surely as the elements of war are peace, so the end of such a peace is war.

MAKES HIS BOW.

In conclusion, he thanked the audience for their patient attention. His had been an ungrateful task, for no one loves to listen to talk of war. He had, however, not been saying what was desirable, but what the signs of the times showed. It signified nothing to say he (speaker) was a Revolutionist; he was not a Republican because he was banished, but he was banished because he was a Republican.

Mr. Mitchel then retired amidst prolonged applause, which lasted until the majority of his audience had dispersed.

JOHN BANIM'S FIRST LOVE.

From the Irish Quarterly Review.

He was just eighteen years of age, about the middle height, and of good figure. His face was oval, and though not handsome, his high broad forehead, and his dark-hued eyes, teeming with life and spirit, saved him from the designation, ugly. And now the common fate was his. Tennyson sings of youth—and our poet-painter was no exception to the rule. He was the admirer of every pretty girl in Kilkenny, and between rhyming, painting, flirting, and book-lending, his entire time was fully occupied.

"In the spring, a young man's fancy lights turns to thoughts of love."

One evening, whilst he was sitting at tea with his mother, the good woman abruptly said to him,—

"John."

"Well, mother?" was the response.

"Whom do you love, John?" she continued.

"Well, mother," he replied, "upon my word there are so many of them that I am afraid I can't particularize; but let me see"—and, counting his fingers, he added, "there's Mary, and there's Anne, and there's Kate, and there's Jane."

"John, John," cried the mother, smiling at the confession, "you know well that is not the answer I thought you to give to the question—long ago you knew it and would say, 'I love God above all things, and my neighbour as myself for the love of God.' I see, John, your boyish days are over."

Truly, the boyish days were over, the catechism was forgotten, and the dream of youth was upon him.

At one of the schools which he attended, as the teacher of drawing, was a young girl, named Anne D——, a boarder in the establishment, and a pupil of Banim's. She was a fair, bright-eyed girl, in the full, fresh beauty of seventeen, artless, innocent, and pure-minded. The young teacher, the poet, and the painter, forgot the grave moral of the history of the tutor Abelard and the pupil Eloise, and, day by day, a deep, whole-heart passion grew within her breast, and each attendance at the school served but to strengthen his affection. He dared not tell her of his love, but love, when the youth is only in his nineteenth year, and the maiden in her eighteenth, cannot long lie hidden, and soon each read in the eyes of each, that tale of passion which was to end but in the death of one—in the long and lingering agony of the other.

When Banim found that this girl loved him, he seemed another being. He concealed his affection from all; he told his brother that his mornings were devoted to sketching the landscapes around Kilkenny, but these early morning hours were the trysting times when he and Anne D—— roamed along the quiet banks of the Nore, or strolled through the fields, accompanied by an under governess, who aided the young lovers, and devised means by which the absence of her charge might escape detection.

For both it was a happy dream—for them—

"Love took up a glass of Time, and turn'd it in his glowing hands;
Every moment lightly shaken, ran itself in golden sands.
Love took up the harp of Life, and smote on all the chords with might;
Smote the chord of Self, that, trembling, pass'd in music out of sight."

Mornings of love, days of loving musing, nights of dreaming love, rarely continue unnoticed by those who are intimate with the lover, and Banim's brother having discovered this secret of his morning's walks, was made his confidant in the confession—"I loved Anne D—— as boy never loved girl before."

Banim's nature was impetuous, and having assured himself of his mistress's affection he resolved to wait upon her father and demand her hand. A year had passed since he first loved her, and he would not be satisfied until he called her his wife. He was not twenty years of age, his profession was no more than sufficient to support him, his friends were reduced in circumstances, owing to the inability of some persons to repay certain sums of money lent by old Michael Banim, but all prudential considerations were despised by the lover, and so he went forth, accompanied by a friend, to seek the consent of Anne's father.

Anne D—— was the illegitimate daughter of a gentleman residing in a neighboring county. He was a surly, rude-tempered old man, and replied to Banim's request of his daughter's hand with sneers and scoffing. The young lover retorted the insulting expressions used; both parties were violent, and recriminations were ended by the order of the old man that Banim should at once leave the house. He returned to Kilkenny, dispirited and heart-sick; he had never permitted himself to contemplate a rejection of his suit, and when he, the same evening, obtained an interview with Anne D——, it was one of tears and sorrow—it was the last time he ever spoke to her, save clandestinely.

The doors of the school in which Anne resided were closed against him; all communication was barred between them, and by stratagem alone could he tell her how deeply and how truly she was still beloved. All means of addressing her were tried, and those who watched Anne, and her fellow-pupils, as on Sunday evenings they left the Church, might have observed a figure clothed as a countrywoman, in long grey cloak and full deep hood, stealing close to Anne's side—this was Banim disguised, and it was on these occasions that he contrived to press his mistress's hand, whilst he placed within it a poem, or letter, telling her to love and hope. In this manner, and by transmitting notes in his sister's school-basket, he was enabled to communicate with her.

Anne's father induced a female relative of the girl to call upon her at the school, and by a pretended sympathy, endeavor to discover if her love for Banim were real and deep. The plan succeeded; Anne told the whole story of her heart—it was considered that absence alone could cure her girlish folly, and her father arranged that she should be secretly removed from school, and placed in the hands of one of her mother's family. She was removed, but Banim discovered the day and hour at which she was to leave, and the route by which she was to travel. He found that the chaise, bearing Anne and her female protector, was to pass by his father's door—he took his place by the threshold, and as the carriage rolled by, he rushed, bareheaded, before the vehicle; to avoid the danger of overturning him, the horses were suddenly and violently checked, Anne leaned from the window, pale and terrified, and sobbing bitterly, the lovers' eyes met but for a moment, the carriage moved quickly onward, and John Banim never more in life saw Annie D——.

He re-entered the house, and uttered no cry, but sat in stony sorrow; a small parcel was placed in his hand, it was addressed to him, the handwriting was that of Anne, he tore it eagerly open—it contained his own miniature which he had painted for her, and which for months she had wore, concealed in her bosom; the parcel also contained his letters and verses. He examined the miniature closely—it bore no secret line; he pored over the papers in hope that they might conceal some covert intimation that this return of all his offerings was not Anne's own free act—but all was as he had written, not one line or word to tell him she was faithful—he paused a moment, looking upon the miniature, and then dashing it to the ground, crushed it to atoms beneath his feet—tore the letters and verses into fragments and as he scattered them away—as the memory of all his hopes and joys came back upon him, when he thought of their vows and promises he cried, bitterly and fiercely, "Curse her—curse her—to abandon me and break my heart!" and burst into angry tears.

No commiseration could soothe him; no attention could win a smile, or word of pleasure from his lips. His constant complaint was, that Anne had abandoned him, although no earthly power could induce him to forget or abandon her. Now she was false, false as only a heartless woman can be, and in his despair he wrote such lines as the following;—

Thou that in youthful folly's bow'r
Wouldst lavish thus an idle hour;
Thou that wouldst fondly hope to win
The love a woman's heart within—
Go, heart of hope, to pleasure's sleep,
But let it be nor long nor deep.
Go, taste the bloom of woman's lip,
But only taste and lightly sip—
Go, if it suit thy sparkling soul,
On passion's frantic wave to roll;
Partake of ev'ry boasted feeling
Of all that's worth a lover's stealing;
But give thy lightest pleasure hour
Alone, to love's delusive power;
Pledge not thy faith a hair beyond
The sigh of sense or passion fond.
Let not one vital chord of thine
Round faithless woman's heart entwine—
No youthful hope shall perish then,
As fickle woman roams amain;
No fainting pulse, no brimming eye
Shall note the wanton trifler fly:
No riven heart-strings there shall break,
When woman spurns her bondage weak;
And not a withering pang shall wait
To blast thy hopes and gloom thy fate.

But Anne was not faithless, and to the last hour of his life Banim regretted his doubt of her affection—he learned but too late that

"—— Love is love for evermore."

The house to which Anne D—— had been removed was situated about twenty-five miles from Kilkenny, and the affection that still lingered in Banim's heart induced him to open a new correspondence with her. He sent the letters by trusty messengers; he knew that they had been deposited in places with which Anne was acquainted; he wrote again in all the fervor of his earlier love, but to none of his letters was there a reply. Anne was not faithless; she received one only letter, and that the first, all gloomy and half upbraiding; she was detected in the act of reading it, and the succeeding letters were intercepted.

Anne made no complaint. She thought of the past-by days of joys—of the mornings when out by the sunny river she had heard the tale of love, as only youth in its spring can breathe it, whilst around the path of the poet-painter and his fair bright idol—and pining for the loss of all her heart held dear, her cheek grew pale, her step lost all its bounding lightness, and her eyes shone with that terrible brilliancy which shows the wasting of life, and then it was plain that the fiend Consumption had seized her. She never struggled against the disease; she was removed from the school in Kilkenny in the month of September, and whilst Banim was condemning her as a heartless mistress, she was expiring with his love the sole treasure of her life,—and in the November following her removal from school, a period of less than two months, Anne D—— was dead.

"The summer murmur'd with her leafy lips,"

Banim was informed of the melancholy catastrophe, the day succeeding that of her decease, and then came the full tide of sorrow upon his heart, for in hearing she was dead, he heard also that her lov for him had been the cause of all her griefs, and in her agony his name had been the last upon her lips.

When he discovered that she was no more, he merely said to his brother, who was appalled by the pain displayed in his features, "Anne D—— is dead," and returning to his bed-room, remained in solitude and silence.

He rose early the following morning—it was cold November weather, the rain was falling, and a gloom was in the sky and upon the earth. Banim left his home, wishing once more to look upon the victim who had been so dear in life, but who now, in death, was dearer, than ever. He was too poor to hire a chaise; he borrowed a horse, but he could not endure the slow, steady pace of the animal, and when about a mile from Kilkenny sent it back by a country child, and continued his way on foot.

He never knew by what route, or how, he traversed the twenty-five dreary miles which lay between him and the corpse of his beloved, but night had closed around the dripping weary man as he reached the farm-house where the body of Anne D—— lay. None of her relatives were present as he entered, and but few friends sat around. He stood beside the dead one's head, and the long black lashes of the closed eyes resting upon the pallid cheek, the shrunken features and the worn look of her whom he had once thought so beautiful, from whom he had so recently parted in all the glory of her youth, terrified him, and he gazed upon her, but shed no tear. His face of agony attracted the attention of those persons who had gathered by the coffin, and as he stood beside its head, one of Anne's half-sisters recognised him, called him the murderer of her sister, and demanded that he should be thrust from the room.

At first Banim felt indignant at this cruel conduct, but suddenly he thought that if Anne had never loved him she might be then living happily; had she never seen him she might be joyous and in health, but now she was a wreck of hope, of peace, of life, and scarcely daring to look upon her, he tottered from the room. He had eaten nothing since the preceding day, he felt no hunger, but, entering an out-house, sunk upon the wet straw of a car-shed, and there, in a stupor of grief, continued until he heard the funeral guests assembled.

He rose, re-entered the house, and being permitted to stand beside the coffin, saw the face of his Anne for the last time, as the coffin-lid hid it for ever. He followed the body to the churchyard, stood by as the earth was piled up, and when all had departed, cast himself upon the fresh green mound that marked the grave of his first love. He never could recollect where the night succeeding this day of woe was passed, but the following morning his brother met him about ten miles from home. Leaning upon the arm extended to him, he trailed his limbs along until he reached his father's house; with his brother's help he ascended to his room, and though from the time they had met upon the road no word had been spoken by either, yet when entering his apartment he appeared to recognise it; the feeling of consciousness was but momentary, and he sunk upon his bed, powerless and senseless, prostrated in mind and body.

During the twelve months succeeding this day Banim merely existed. His whole system seemed shattered. His head ached so violently, that in his paroxysms of pain, his body rocked with an involuntary motion so violent, that as his head rested upon his brother's breast, it required all the latter's strength to curb the violent swaying of the sufferer. "It seemed," he said, "as if the brain were surging through the skull from rear to front, and from front to rear, alternately." He lost all anxiety for his profession or for literature, no occupation could interest him, he could rarely be induced to leave the house, and when he did go abroad, he quickly became wearied; he seldom spoke—and thus his first love laid the seeds of that frightful suffering, which, during the greater portion of his existence, rendered him one of the most miserable of men. The three nights of suffering and exposure to which, at Anne D——'s decease, he was subjected, broke down the stamina of life, and left him, at twenty years of age, a victim to spinal disease, which, but a few years later, reduced him to a crippled body, whilst gifted with a mind active as ever genius possessed,—his fate, indeed, was harder than that of Tantalus.

The first symptom of returning health evinced by the sufferer was the composition of some verses. They show the weary spirit that would free itself from all recollections of the past and would

"Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow;
Raze out the written troubles of the brain."

Sorrow, however, at nineteen, cannot be very deeply seated, and he must be melo-dramatic indeed, who fancies that in plucking it from its bosom, his heart may form his root; and thus, as time rolled on, Banim found that the world had its joys still, even after all his woes, and so, for him, once more arose the bright blue days—

"Full of the sun, loud with a thousand larks."

The condition of the University of Virginia is said never before to have been so good as at present. The number of students at this early period of the season is larger than at the close of the last session, which was larger than any previous period in the history of the University. There are now 602 students from the following States:—New-York, 2; Pennsylvania, 1; Ohio, Delaware, Maryland, 10; District of Columbia, 10; North Carolina, 6; South Carolina, 43; Georgia, 31; Florida, 7; Alabama, 49; Mississippi, 34; Louisianna, 39; Texas, 7; California, 2; Arkansas, 1; Missouri, 3; Kentucky, 11; Tennessee, 9. Making in all from other States, 272; from Virginia, 330—total, 602.

Literary and Artistic News.

We take great pleasure in announcing that Mr. T. Addison Richards, the distinguished artist, will give instruction at his Studio in the University, or, in private classes, to Art-Students professional or amateur;—especially to ladies or gentlemen who may desire to prepare themselves as Teachers. His course of studies embrace—the use of the lead pencil and the crayon; perspective; landscape painting, in oil and water colors; designing and drawing on wood and stone, &c. Our art-loving friends would be repaid by a visit to Richard's studio, in one of the sky parlors in the University.

The Rev. Spencer Northcote, a gentleman who has within the last few years joined the Catholic Church, delivered a lecture in Liverpool upon the Roman catacombs. The catacombs are the excavations under the city of Rome and the vicinage, used as places of sepulchre. In the early periods of Christianity, the disciples of our Lord worshiped in those catacombs, as being the places where they would be most free from the interruptions of their Pagan persecutors, and there also they deposited their dead. Their chapels there were decorated by paintings, and their tombs by inscriptions, many of which are now brought to light for the first time. The Rev. Mr. Maitland, chaplain to the late Bishop of London, we believe, has written a very learned work on those subterranean depositories, and to them also Mr. Northcote, since his change of faith, has given much attention. His lecture was directed to show that the decorations and symbolical figures used so largely in Roman Catholic churches are similar to those which are daily discovered among those catacombs, and which are admittedly of the early Christian ages, he also quoted inscriptions copied from the tombs in those regions, which show that the belief in the efficacy of the intercession of the departed just, for those yet living. We may also state, says the Liverpool Daily Post, for the satisfaction of archæologists, that Mr. Northcote says that 11,000 inscriptions have been collected and that these with illustrative drawings and descriptions will be soon given to the world.

The method of portrait-painting introduced in Paris by Horace Vernet the well known artist, consists, first, in mixing the colors with olive oil, which avoids the drying of the colors and the cleansing of the brushes. When the painting is finished a layer of the absorbing earth is applied to the back of the canvas, the oil is absorbed, and the painting becomes a pastile or crayon drawing. The earth is then removed and a coat of flaxseed oil is substituted, which penetrates the colors, and the work is done. This method is said to be superior to any other practised in this beautiful art, and the pictures are described as of peculiar excellence.

Ernest Jones, the Chartist Leader, is holding political soirées in London. At his last he delivered a lecture on "an ancient fabric, founded on the darkness of the middle ages—the British Constitution." He confined himself, on this occasion, to the fundamental basis and chief evil of that Constitution, "the hereditary landed aristocracy." In his next he was to treat of "one of its main pillars—the Established Church."

There appear at present in Italy 311 newspapers—partly political, partly scientific and artistic. They are distributed over the Peninsula, in the following way:—85 appear in Lombardy, 87 in Sardinia, 5 in Parma and Modena, 33 in Tuscany, 30 in the Papal Dominions, and 56 in the Kingdom of both the Sicilies. The number of newspapers published in the little Kingdom of Saxony is 220, in Austria 281, in Bavaria 178, in Wurtemburg 99, and in Hanover 89.

The London papers are unanimous in praise of the American actor, Mr. James E. Murdoch, who has been playing at the Haymarket. He performed Young Mirabel, in the comedy of the Inconstant, for twenty consecutive nights, and on the 20th ult., opened as Rover, in O'Keefe's comedy of Wild Oats, which the Times, Post, News, Chronicle, and Herald all unite in placing as the finest light comedy personation seen for many years in England.

The proprietor of the New Orleans True Delta finding that the business of his paper, now well established, is too much for one person to manage, is desirous of disposing of a third or half interest to a respectable person. "Any gentleman anxious to become associated in a newspaper of assured standing and brilliant prospects, will find this a most eligible opportunity."

Among the prizes for the present year at Harvard College are two for the greatest skill in mathematics, the first of $300, and the second prize of $200. These are styled the 'Boyden prizes,' and are by far the most generous of any that have ever been offered at any of our American colleges.

Calbert Vaux, an architect of established fame, is preparing a work on villas and cottages, with a series of designs of houses, illustrated by about three hundred engravings. Mr. Vaux was the partner of the late Andrew J. Downing, who did so much to improve the rural architecture of our country. Mr. Vaux gives plans for every style of country house, at every imaginable price, ranging from $1,500 to $40,000.

The first Russian newspaper was published in 1703, and Peter the Great was its senior editor. The Imperial Autocrat not only took part in its editorial composition, but in correcting proofs, as appears from sheets still in existence, on which are marks and alterations in his own hand.

The Boston Public Library, has 28,080 volumes, exclusive of those already received from the last liberal donation of Mr. Bates, and of tracts, 12,380; last year the library contalned 22,617 volumes, and 6,407 tracts. Of the additions the past year, 1,865 volumes, and 5,330 pamphlets, have been donations.

A collection of idols and other curious antiquities from Mexico, obtained by an officer of the United States Army during the late war, has been added to the Antiquarian Cabinet in the Museum of the College of Charleston. They were presented by a lady of Charleston.

The Hon. Mrs. Granville Whyte, who is now residing at the Brevoort House, is the authoress of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "The Ogilvies," "Agatha's Husband," &c. Miss Mulock is her nom de plume, by which she is as well known in England, as Queechy is by hers, or L. E. L. by hers.

Meetings have been held through Lincoln, England, with the object of raising funds for a suitable monument to the late Sir John Franklin. The people of Spilby, the birth-place of Sir John are particularly active in the matter.

Schiller's portrait, after the bust of his friend the great sculptor Danneker, and the painting of Hageman, has been lithographed by Beneke, and published by T. H. Kleefish of this city. The size is about half the size of life.

A volume of Poor Richard's Almanac—the original edition—sold recently in New-York for $62. This may be appreciating Dr. Franklin, but it is making a queer use of the advice he has given us.

A complete edition of the works of Frederick the Great will shortly be published in Berlin, in thirty-two volumes.

"The Great Autumn Cup," the gift of the Captains of America and the stevedores of Liverpool, to be run for at the forthcoming Autumn Meeting at Liverpool, is described by Bell's Life. The cup is executed in the Renaissance style, after the design of an amateur artist. The cup and cover stand 2 1-2 feet high, and are of solid silver. On one side is engraved upon a shield—formed by the twining together of the flags of the two nations, guarded by the British lion and surmounted by the American eagle—"Liverpool Autumn Meeting," and the names of the stewards, sufficient space being left for the insertion of the fortunate winner of this magnificent trophy; and on the reverse is a view of the port of Liverpool, with one of the American steamers "steaming out" for the "States," a portrait of whose President adorns this side of the cup. The whole is exquisitely chased in bold relief, and on the top of the cover is a beautifully designed thorough-bred mare and foal, whilst the handles are formed of horses most classically arranged.

Professor N. M. Hentz died at the residence of his son, Dr. C. A. Hentz, at Marianna, Fla., on the 4th ult. Prof. Hentz was a French gentleman of varied accomplishments, and well known as a teacher in many seminaries of learning in different parts of our country. He was associated with the distinguished historian, Hon. G. Bancroft, as a teacher at Northampton, and subsequently at Cincinnati, and at Chapel Hill, N. C., as Professor of Modern Languages and Belles-Lettres. Mr. Hentz was not only successful as an instructor, but largely enriched the scientific literature of our country. His treatises upon natural history have placed him among the first scholars of our country in this department of learning. It is less than a year ago that the death of his accomplished wife, Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz, was announced.

BY M. W.

The testimonial to be presented to Mr. MICHAEL BARRY, by his friends, previous to his leaving New-York, will take place on the evening of Tuesday, the 9th December, 1856, at Mrs. Luby's Academy, 275 Bleecker street.

Those who wish to participate in duly honoring the ever-faithful friend and servant of Irish Freedom—the faithful watcher of the poor people's interests in years of Famine—the honest opposer and exposer of the swindlers who were among the Relief Committee of that time in Cork; the perpetual advocate and staunch supporter of Father Matthew in the cause of Temperance—and the silent, true friend in time of need—can do so by coming to the Dinner to be given him on the evening above mentioned, or by forwarding their aid to the Testimonial through any of the undersigned gentlemen.

Adjutant C. Murphy, 44th street, near 9th Avenue, is the Treasurer. All favors will be acknowledged at the Dinner.

Mr. B. is obliged to return to Ireland to recover his health, now impaired by long illness; he is a member of the "Fitzgerald Guard," of New-York.

Tickets for the Dinner may be had of any of the under-named, or at the IRISH NEWS office, 29 Ann street. The whole affair will be conducted in a highly respectable manner.

Gentlemen who wish, may bring ladies, as there will be a band present; and those who like to enjoy the pleasure of the ball-room, after Dinner, can do so. Mrs. Luby (that truly Irish lady) will there be the light and life of all. So let all who are to be present on the occasion prepare themselves for one of the happiest evenings they ever enjoyed in New-York.

Give to goodness honor due,
Drink to the poor man if he's true;
And ne'er forget that Star's the best
That's worn not on but in the breast.—E. C.

Brady's Photographic Palace of Art.—Who would not desire to possess a memento, so perfect and life-like of a dead relative or friend, as can be furnished by the photographic art? What more acceptable present can be given or received than one of Brady's splendid, almost speaking portraits, which reflect the expression as well as the features of their originals? Those who desire beautiful portraits of the members of their family, should take care to have them in the highest style of art. Strangers visiting this city, will find no spot more interesting than BRADY'S DAGUERRIAN GALLERY AND PALACE OF PHOTOGRAPHIC ART, No. 205 Broadway.

Important to All.

We are happy to announce to our readers that Dr. WESLEY GRINDLE, of New-York, so justly renowned for his unprecedented success in the treatment of Pulmonary Diseases, has, by the earnest solicitation of the people of this community, established a house in Philadelphia, No. 70 South Third-street. His house in New-York is No. 54 White-street. The business here is conducted by his brother and partner, JOSIAH S. GRINDLE.

His MAGIC COMPOUND, from what we have seen and heard, seems to be a remarkable cure for that hitherto terrible foe to human happiness and life PULMONARY CONSUMPTION! Hundreds have actually been permanently cured, who were pronounced incurable by the most skilful physicians, and given up to die. It is, no doubt, a fact, and statistics are being collected to prove the assertion, that in towns where Dr. Grindle's medicine has been, and is being used, the mortality from this disease has greatly diminished! And in exact proportion to the sale of the medicine, there has been an astonishing decrease in the number of deaths from Consumption.

This, then, is no quack nostrum, but a great remedy! And we cannot too strongly recommend it for the cure of all pulmonary complaints, and do candidly advise the afflicted to obtain it at once. Dr. Grindle has persevered until, at least, we verily believe he has found the very remedy destined by Providence for this disease. Reader! do not allow your friends to fall into early graves, when you have the means within your reach to snatch them from that frightful doom.

For the gratification of our readers, we quote the Doctor's following prices:—One box, $3; three boxes, ordered at one time, $8; half dozen $14; one dozen, or any number greater, $2 a box. The postage in the United States, not over 3000 miles, is fifteen cents a box; over 3000 miles, fifty cents a box. In all cases where postage must be prepaid, the amount should be enclosed in money or stamps. We are authorized to say that all orders addressed to Dr. W. Grindle & Bro., Philadelphia, or New-York, will receive prompt attention.—Philadelphia City Item.

We regret to learn, says the Athlone Sentinel, that the quantity of diseased potatoes in this neighborhood is found to be far greater than was anticipated. In the digging in of the crop it has been discovered that a large number are unsound, and in some instances where they had been sown in rich land the crop is scarcely worth gathering, being nearly all black. It has also been remarked that when potatoes are housed the disease rapidly extends amongst them. As the crop is a very abundant one, it is expected that there will be a plentiful supply notwithstanding; but it is indisputable that the disease has manifested itself in no inconsiderable degree.

On the 6th ult., on the lands of Artagle, near O'Brien's bridge, two men named Skehan and Macmahon, were at work, and quarrelled in consequence of a bit of tobacco. They had a regular stand up fight, and were put asunder, and all seemed over, when about an hour afterwards Skehan went over to Macmahon, who was under him in a drain, and gave him a blow of a spade which split his skull, inflicting a frightful wound. Macmahon is since the occurrence speechless. Skehan has absconded.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—A very melancholy and fatal accident happened to a son, aged five years, of the Rev. Robert Fleming, at his residence Conyngham road. The poor child, while eating lunch, was unhappily choked, a piece of meat sticking fast in his throat. Medical aid was promptly called, but without effect.

Mr. Pierce Sinnott, of Galbally, near Castlebridge, Co. Wexford, died suddenly at his residence on the 8th ult. He went to bed in the enjoyment of good health, and was found dead in the morning.

Last accounts from Ireland state the farmers were actively employed in digging in the potatoes and getting down the wheat.

After a sharp contest with Henry Denny Esq., John Kenny, Esq., was elected Alderman of the West Ward of the Borough of Waterford, in room of Alderman Foristal, deceased.

In the Callan Workhouse on the 8th ult., there were 392 inmates in the house. At the same time last year it contained 419.

THE GREAT RUSSIAN REMEDY.

Pro Bono Publico.

"EVERY MOTHER SHOULD HAVE A BOX IN THE HOUSE HANDY IN CASE OF ACCIDENTS TO THE CHILDREN."

REDDING'S RUSSIAN SALVE. It is a Boston remedy of thirty years' standing, and is recommended by physicians. It is a sure and speedy cure for Burns, Piles, Boils, Corns, Felons, Chilblains, and old Sores of every kind.

For Fever Sores, Ulcers, Itch, Scald Head, Nettle Rash, Bunions, Sore Nipples, (recommended by nurses); Whitlows, Stiles, Festers, Flea Bites, Spider Stings, Frozen Limbs, Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore and Cracked Lips, Sore Nose, Warts and Flesh Wounds, it is a most valuable remedy and cure, which can be testified to by thousands who have used it in the city of Boston and vicinity for the last thirty years.

In no instance will this Salve do an injury, or interfere with a physician's prescriptions. It is made from the purest materials, from a recipe brought from Russia, of articles growing in that country, and the proprietors have letters from all classes, clergymen, physicians, sea captains, nurses, and others who have used it themselves and recommend it to others.

REDDING'S RUSSIAN SALVE is put in large tin boxes, stamped on the cover with the picture of a horse and a disabled soldier, which picture is also engraved on the wrapper. PRICE, 25 Cents a Box. Sold at all the stores in town or country, or may be ordered of any wholesale druggist.

Medical.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparen expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

ELIZABETHAN ALE.

MEDICAL men now very generally recommend the occasional use of pure ale to those who are in need of nourishment; and it is undoubtedly the most wholesome beverage for general use that can be found. This is not a new idea. In Queen Elizabeth's time our ancestors universally consumed it—from Elizabeth herself, in her palace, to the farmer in the field. In those days, adulterated wines and fiery liquors may be said to have been unknown, and very heavy penalties were enacted against using anything except malt and hops in brewing. It is not at all extravagant to assert, that the average duration of the life of a large portion of our race is a third less than it was two or three huudred years ago, and this is chiefly attributable to what we eat and what we drink. Even now the heartiest people that can be found are from the rural districts of England, who yet follow the old fashioned diet.

All who use ale, whether as a beverage or for the purpose of nourishment, will find the Elizabethan Ale most excellent. Being made on the Scotch plan, it is as pure and wholesome, (if not equal in flavor) as the imported, while its cost is but little more than a common article. Special Notices.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, New-York, Aug. 13, 1856.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That the following ordinance, relative to express wagons, carts, cartmen, &c., &c., having been adopted, its provisions will hereafter be enforced.

FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

AN ORDINANCE

To amend an Ordinanae entitled "An Ordinance for the licensing, and otherwise regulating the use and employment of express wagons, carts and cartmen, &c., &c., approved by the Mayor June 2, 1851."

The Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New-York, in Common Council convened, do ordain as follows:

That section 2 of said Ordinance, relating to carts and cartmen, be amended, so as to read as follows:

SECTION 2.—The Mayor shall from time to time license and appoint so many and such persons as he may think proper, to set up and keep public carts in said city, Provided, that no one person shall be so licensed to keep more than three such public carts.

And he shall also license so many and such persons as he may think proper, to be public cartmen of said city, and he may revoke or suspend any or all such licenses at his pleasure. All persons licensed as foresaid, to keep public carts, shall be deemed to be public cartmen, within the meaning of this Ordinance; but it shall not be lawful for any person to receive or to hold a license to keep public carts, or to be a public cartman, unless he be a citizen of the United States, and resident within the State of New-York, and is the actual owner of the cart or carts, with good horses therefor, so licensed to be kept as public carts; and the Mayor may examine, under oath, all persons applying for or holding any such license, or the renewal thereof, touching their qualifications as aforesaid, and all licences other than to persons so qualified shall be void.

Adopted by the Board of Councilmen, May 9, 1856.
Adopted by the Board of Aldermen, July 15, 1856.
Approved by the Mayor July 30, 1856.

KEATING'S IRELAND.

A NEW TRANSLATION OF THE

FORAS FEASA AR ERINN;

OR, GENERAL HISTORY OF IRELAND.

From a Manuscript Copy of the Original Irish of the Rev. and Learned GEOFFREY KEATING.

With Notes, Historical, Topographical, and Explanatory,

By JOHN O'MAHONY, Esq.

The work is now in course of preparation, and will be speedily published, in one large octavo volume of about 600 pages, with plates. Price to Subscribers, $2,00. The book will be got up in superior style, and furnished to the address of Subscribers giving their names to a duly authorized canvasser, or to P. M. HAVERTY, Publisher, 110 Fulton street, N. Y.

☞ A list of Subscribers will be printed in the work.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., July 10, 1856.

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a Subscriber to Mr. O'Mahony's translation of "Foras Feasa ar Erinn."

That is a book long wanted, and which the Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Elliott had lived, it would have been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America, a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes as Mr. O'Mahony. I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

Faithfully yours, JOHN MITCHEL.

LITTELL, SON & CO., BOSTON.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

THIS work is made up of the elaborate and stately essays of the EDINBURGH, QUARTERLY, and other Reviews; and BLACKWOOD' noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen Political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History and Common Life, by the sagacious SPECTATOR, the sparkling EXAMINER, the judicious ATHENÆUM, the busy and industrious LITERARY GAZETTE, the sensible and comprehensive BRITANNIA, the sober and respectable CHRISTIAN OBSERVER; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the UNITED SERVICE, and with the best articles of the DUBLIN UNIVERSITY, NEW MONTHLY, FRASER'S, TAIT'S, AINSWORTH'S, HOOD'S and SPORTING MAGAZINES, and of Chambers' admirable JOURNAL. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from PUNCH; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of THE TIMES. We shall increase our variety by importations from the Continent of Europe, and from the growth of the British Colonies.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday—price, (free of postage) six dollars a year. Remittances for any period will be promptly attended to.

Complete sets of the FIRST SERIES, in thirty-six volumes, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principle cities, free of expense of freight, are for sale for Seventy-two Dollars. The Second Series began in 1858.

Any volume may be had separately, at Two Dollars, bound, or a Dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents—and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

☞ A few advertisements of Books, Patents, or other matters of general interest, will be added, at reasonable rates.

Extracts of Letters from Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, and President Adams.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I have read the prospectus with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give healthy tone, not only to our literature but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character.

JOSEPH STORY.

NEW-YORK, May 7, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of the "Living Age;" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates (of which I have no reason to doubt), it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. JAMES KENT.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe, and in this country, this has appeared to me the most useful. It contains, indeed, the exposition only of the current literature of the English language; but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind, in the utmost expansion of the present age. J. Q. ADAMS.

THE PANORAMA OF LIFE AND LITERATURE.

Published Monthly at the Office of Littell's Living Age,

Boston.

Every number of this work contains articles of leading interest; grave and earnest, yet not heavy; popular, and yet of abiding value. To these are added, in profuse abundance and great variety, Tales, Poetry, Voyages, Travels, and whatever—within the bounds of sound taste and good principles—may be included under the large head of Light Reading. But mere light reading soon becomes wearisome, unless there breathe from it spirit and heart, life and soul.

We promise a Magazine that shall be more and better than mere amusement: a Book suited to the leisure of the old and wise, and yet abundantly attractive to the young and ardent. It will freely provide for the Imagination, as well as for the Reason and Memory.

For THREE DOLLARS A YEAR, received at the office of publication, the Panorama will be sent (free of postage), to any post-office in the United States.

TWO COPIES, Five Dollars a year; FIVE COPIES, Ten Dollars a year, Clubs to pay their own postage, which is three cents a number, payable QUARTERLY IN ADVANCE.

The first number was issued in July, 1855. It makes two large volumes a year. We can supply orders for back numbers or volumes.

Both Works are Published by Littell, Son & Company, Boston.

WILLIAMS & GUION'S

Old Black Star Line of Packets. 1856.

Passage from any part of Great Britain and Ireland, secured at the lowest possible rates by this old-established line, sailing from Liverpool to New-York every five days, comprising the following magnificent Ships:

Ships.	Captains.	Tonage.
AUSTRALIA,	Smith,	2,000
BRIDGEWATER (new),	Barstow,	2,000
CULTIVATOR (new),	Austin,	2,000
CYNOSURE,	Bray,	2,000

JOHN BRIGHT (new),	Cutting,	2,000
MARMION,	Hanley,	1,200
NORTH AMERICAN,	Clark,	1,800
OSWEGO,	Stevens,	1,400
ROBERT KELLY,	Barstow,	1,500
SILAS WRIGHT (new),	Freeman,	2,000
SOUTHAMPTON,	Furlong,	1,600
THORNTON (new),	Collins,	2,000
TICONDEROGA,	Boyle,	1,400
UNIVERSE,	Cave,	2,000
VANGUARD,	Norton,	1,800

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of the departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; or persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

REMITTANCES.

Persons wanting to send money to their friends can obtain drafts for any amount, which will be cashed at sight at the following Banks:

NOTICE.—The recent failures, by which a large amount of Bills remitted from this country to friends in Ireland, has been returned unpaid, afford to this Society the opportunity, and at the same time impose upon it the duty of informing the public, that such losses would have been prevented if the parties purchasing Bills had availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Society.

For the purpose of entire protection a fund is constantly kept on deposit in the Bank of Ireland, against which this Society issues its drafts, payable at sight (from sums of £1 sterling and upwards), on the Bank and all its branches, and has thereby for the last Ten Years afforded a mode of remittance perfectly safe and unquestionable.

Special Notices.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, New-York, Aug. 18, 1856.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That the following ordinance, relative to express wagons, carts, cartmen, &c., &c., having been adopted, its provisions will hereafter be enforced.

FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

AN ORDINANCE

To amend an Ordinanae entitled "An Ordinance for the licensing, and otherwise regulating the use and employment of express wagons, carts and cartmen, &c., &c., approved by the Mayor June 2, 1851."

The Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New-York, in Common Council convened, do ordain as follows:

That section 2 of said Ordinance, relating to carts and cartmen, be amended, so as to read as follows:

SECTION 2.—The Mayor shall from time to time license and appoint so many and such persons as he may think proper, to set up and keep public carts in said city, Provided, that no one person shall be so licensed to keep more than three such public carts.

And he shall also license so many and such persons as he may think proper, to be public cartmen of said city, and he may revoke or suspend any or all such licenses at his pleasure. All persons licensed as foresaid, to keep public carts, shall be deemed to be public cartmen, within the meaning of this Ordinance; but it shall not be lawful for any person to receive or to hold a license to keep public carts, or to be a public cartman, unless he be a citizen of the United States, and resident within the State of New-York, and is the actual owner of the cart or carts, with good horses therefor, so licensed to be kept as public carts; and the Mayor may examine, under oath, all persons applying for or holding any such license, or the renewal thereof, touching their qualifications as aforesaid, and all licences other than to persons so qualified shall be void.

Adopted by the Board of Councilmen, May 9, 1856.
Adopted by the Board of Aldermen, July 15, 1856.
Approved by the Mayor July 30, 1856.

European News.

The Royal Mail steamship Arabia, from Liverpool on the 22nd of November, brings one week's later dates than those received by the Persia. The news is not important, business and politics being eqnally stagnant.

The American ship General Dunlop, while passing to the eastward, close to Europa Point, missed her stays, and went ashore, and became a total wreck. The crew were saved. H. B. M. steam-sloop Curlew, Capt. Horton, gave prompt aid, which the U. S. Consul at Gibraltar duly acknowledged.

Great Britain.—The ships James Baines and Lightning, had arrived at Liverpool with a million and three hundred thousand pounds in specie. In connection therewith, and with the absence of further withdrawals from the Bank, the Times anticipates an early return to the rate of six per cent., but says much will depend on the next advices from China and India.

The British Government has, at the request of Cyrus W. Field, Esq., of New-York, ordered a steamer to be fitted out under efficient officers, to examine thoroughly the coast of Ireland and Newfoundland, and to sound across the Atlantic between these parts to ascertain the best place for laying and landing the Sub-marine Telegraph cable. The Government has further agreed to guarantee four per cent interest per annum on the whole capital required to manufacture and lay down the cable between Newfoundland and Ireland.

Contracts for the whole extent of the Atlantic cables were signed in London on Tuesday, the 19th ult., one-half to be manufactured by Messrs. W. Keeper, Glass & Co., of London, and the other by R. S. Nowell & Co., of Liverpool. It is all to be completed and placed on board of two steamers, ready for sea, on or before the 31st of May next; and by the 4th of July next it is confidently expected that Great Britain and the United States will be in telegraphic communication.

Mr. Field and Mr. Brett, of London, were received on Thursday morning by the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester, and on the afternoon of the same day by the Commercial Association of that city.

France.—A Paris correspondent writes that the Emperor and Empress, with a select party, will, after all, go to Fontainbleau.

A treaty of commerce has been concluded between France and the Sandwich Islands.

Spain.—The reported arrangement between the Spanish Bourbons had failed. The Queen of Spain was kept in the dark as to the real project of the clerical party, which was her own eventual abdication and the marriage of her daughter to the eldest son of the Infanta, Don Juan.

A republican movement had taken place. At Malaga on the 18th ult., the garrison was attacked by persons proclaiming a Republic. The troops resisted and order was soon re-established. Five of the insurgents were killed. The garrison had seven wounded men. The latest accounts from Spain report the Malaga insurrection as having no political aim, but as simply intended for smuggling purposes. It was understood that all the prisoners had been executed. Further movements were expected, as the incorporation of the militia into the regular army had led to the desertion of vast numbers, who would be, it was thought quite ready for such attempts.

Portugal.—The elections at Lisbon had not been favorable to the Government, a majority being obtained by the candidates of the "Regeneration."

Sicily.—The Governor of Palermo has ordered a strict surveillance to be exercised upon all the French and English commercial vessels. It was probable that within a day or two the Neapolitan question, which had remained in a state of stagnation for a long time, would advance a stage one way or the other.

Denmark.—The Prussian correspondence of Berlin says: "We learn from a good source that the last notes sent to Copenhagen by Prussia and Austria fix the 10th of December as the period when those powers will bring the question of the Sound Dues before the German Diet. In the event of either representations being unattended by the Danish Government, it is announced that England has agreed to pay to Denmark as the price of redeeming the Sound Dues, a capital sum calculated on an annual revenue of £45,000. The British at present pay £70,000 yearly as passing tolls."

The Black Sea.—The Paris Pays contains the following explanation relative to the firing on the English gun-boat at Yenikale: "We believe the affair has been explained to the satisfaction of both parties. The gun-boat being about to pass the Straits, a gun loaded with powder was fired according to common usage as a signal. The captain explained to the commandant of the forts his reason for being in those waters. The first shot not having been heard, a second one was fired, and subsequently a third; after which the English vessel answered and accepted the required parly. The two commanding officers, Russian and English, having exchanged explanations, agreed to refer the matter to the two embassies at Constantinople, and this course having been taken, it was, we understand, amicably arranged."

The East.—Advices from Constantinople of the 13th inst., state that M. D. Bouteniffe had again endeavored to obtain from the Government the dismissal of English ships from the Bosphorus. The attempts of Terouk Khan had failed to effect with Lord Redcliffe a settlement of the disputes between England and Persia. An English frigate had arrived at Constantinople, and other ships were expected.

The London Times, speaking of the threatened disturbance of the Western Alliance, says in its issue of November 15:—"It is now for the first time formally made known to the world, through a perfectly official and authentic channel, that there exists a difference between England and France. This difference, in accordance with the conciliatory spirit which it has so honorably evinced, the Moniteur characterizes as of slight importance—a conclusion in which we regret that we are unable to concur. In differences between friends no good is ever done by undervaluing their importance and seeking to slur over matters that must be peremptorily settled one way or the other, in order to secure an appearance of immediate peace and reconciliation. We do not, then, think it is a subject of small importance whether the matters in difference between England and Russia be settled by a preliminary agreement or by a second conference."

And again—"If this Russian difficulty be not settled before the time appointed for the meeting of Parliament, we forsee infinite perils for the alliance in the discussion which must necessarily ensue."

THE WAR IN ASIA.

Bombay (Oct. 17) Correspondence of the London Times.

Respecting the operations of the Persian army before Herat, I have still nothing but contradictory reports to communicate. The Lahore Chronicle, which as I mentioned a month ago, spoke with confidence of the fall of the place, has now published two letters from Cabul, dated respectively the 5th and 14th of September, which (if they are to be believed) place that matter beyond the possibility of a doubt. They state that Prince Yusuf contrived to lull the suspicions of Esa Khan and his party, and getting the chief into his power, caused him to be put to death, and, displaying his quartered remains over the gates of the city, threatened the like punishment on any that ventured to resist the supremacy of the Persians. Awed and dispirited by the fall of their leader, the Affghans submitted passively to Yusuf and the Persian General, who proceeded to occupy the city in great force. The sons of Esa Khan speedily met the same fate as had already befallen their father.

Thus the Lahore Chronicle. But in the Delhi Gazette we find a letter from Cabul of later date—the 20th of September—from which it would appear that all was still uncertainty at the capital as to the position of affairs at Herat. The reports of the capture of the place are alluded to as propagated by one party, whose opponents on the other hand, maintained that it still held out. As I observed in my last, the success or failure of the Persians appears to be regarded in the light of a party question by the rival factions in Affghanistan, and to be traded upon accordingly. It is abundantly clear, I think, that neither of these conflicting reports are to be implicitly relied on. So says the Cabul letter-writer of the Delhi Gazette. Nothing, he declares, was to be trusted but despatches for the Ameer, from Herat direct, forwarded to the Governor of Cabul for his information, and such despatches he was hoping shortly to receive.

Bombay Gazette extra of this day reprints from an extraordinary edition of the Poona Observer, the following important, if true, intelligence relative to the Persian expedition.

In consequence of instructions received from Bombay by electric telegraph late yesterday evening, a sudden order was issued for the immediate march of the first Company 1st Battalion of European Artillery and the Reserve Details, which arrived the other day from Ahmednuggur, and they accordingly left Poona at a very early hour this morning for Oolwa, en route for the Presidency, to join the force proceeding to the Persian Gulf.

The orders for these movements were issued at 10 o'clok last night, upon the receipt of instructions by electric telegraph.

The troops under orders to join the expedition have for some days past been thoroughly equipped and ready to start at a moment's notice. The men are in the highest spirits, and are rejoiced at the prospects of the approaching cold weather campaign.

A report has just reached us that the force to be sent against Persia from the Bombay Presidency alone is to be increased from 5,000 to 15,000.

It is rumored that the orders for these movements of troops have been issued under instructions received by the Bombay Government from Lord Canning, by electric telegraph, and that the Government of India has received the final instructions of the home authorites for the dispatch of the expedition by the last overland mail. It would also appear that the dispatch containing the declaration of war against Persia was sent through our Ambassador at Constantinople. It is strange that duplicates of these dispatches were not sent to the Bombay Government, even as a mere act of courtesy.

The British Press on Mr. Buchanan's Election.

From the London Times, Nov. 17.

If we may believe the information communicated to us by the agent of the Associated New-York Press, Mr. Buchanan was elected President on the 4th inst., and will shortly be the Chief Magistrate of the United States. So ends the long struggle which has convulsed the Union during many months. The questions as to the preponderance of the slaveholding power and the extension of Slavery into new territories are resolved in a manner unfavorable to the hopes of the North and of that great portion of the English community which sympathised with Northern policy and traditions. But not only is the fate of Kansas decided by this event, but the foreign policy of the Union must be held to be deeply influenced in a sense contrary to the wishes of moderate men, both at home and in Europe.

It cannot be forgotten that Mr. Buchanan, when Minister to this country, gave but little assistance to the peaceful settlement of the questions that had arisen between America and England. It has been thought, and not without reason, that Lord Clarendon's endeavors to terminate more than one dispute were baffled by the American representative, not with any wish to involve the two countries in war—an event which he probably thought no amount of acrimony could bring about—but because he saw in the continuance of this angry spirit an electioneering advantage to himself in his candidateship for the Presidency. Nor can it be forgotten that at the Ostend Conference, where doctrines entirely subversive of the commonest rights of nations were promulgated, Mr. Buchanan took a principal part. The acquisition of Cuba by almost any means was adopted by the Conference as the keystone of a true American Statesman's foreign policy, and it may be inferred by analogy that aggression on other American States with valuable ports or territory would follow in due course.

With respect, therefore, to the event which has just taken place, we can only repeat the observations which we made when the Pennsylvania election showed that it was imminent. We cannot pretend to judge the public men of the Union except by the light which their own actions and the opinions of their countrymen furnish; neither would it become us to express immoderate joy or regret at the result of a domestic political contest in a foreign country; yet, as the American Statesman, by his own confession and by the common report of his countrymen, holds views inconsistent with the independence of certain neighboring States, we cannot but think that, so far, the endorsement of his claims by the majority of his countrymen is in fact to be viewed with regret.

It may reassure the world, however, to find that the Northern States, which have been so moved by this long contest, are disposed, now that it is over, to pay willing obedience to the new magistrate and the Government which he may inaugurate. Submission to the will of the majority is part of the American nature. It is therefore probable that in a few weeks much of the anger and exaggeration of the last six months will have passed away. We cannot agree with those who have been lately speaking of a disruption of the American Union. In past times the probability of such an event was often discussed in European circles, but the very notion was ridiculed by every American. He would say that the inviolability of the Union was an idea cherished by an American from youth to the grave, and that an eminent politician had been unable during his whole life to attain to the Presidency because he had on one occasion set up the authority of an individual State against the Federal Government.

But lately we have had native Americans debating not only whether such disruption might not be possible, but also whether it would not be advisable to effect it at once. The result of this election will set the matter at rest. It will be seen that the whole American people will acquiesce in the solemn verdict which has been taken. Perhaps there is not so much sincerity in the dislike to slavery as might be thought from the bitterness of the struggle; perhaps vested rights and the instinct of property prevail; at any rate, at present the North will acquiesce in all that the South has demanded; Kansas will be a Slave State, and the fugitive slave law will be strictly enforced, and everything will go on in the old way for four years more.

But, leaving the domestic institution, we have a right to criticise more freely the election in its bearing on international politics. We are the people most nearly concerned with the American Union; the citizens of the two countries are brought into constant contact; we have large dealings with the States which are most opposed to American aggression; we have, therefore, a claim to speak in the matter. If the antecedents of a long life may be used as a basis for judging a statesman's career, it may be thought that Mr. Buchanan is less the enthusiastic promoter of a policy in which he believes than the embodiment of the notions which are for a time dominant in the American Democracy.

The new President is rather a man who seeks for popularity and office than one resolute to carry out schemes on which he is fixedly set. He was not a candidate tor the Presidency because he wished to make aggression on Spain, but accepted strong language regarding Spanish rights because it would tell on the election for the Presidency. It may be hoped, however, that now he is at the summit of his ambition, he will disengage himself from those dangerous schemes to which he has seemingly committed himself. From this point of view Mr. Buchanan may, in spite of the Ostend Manifesto, endorsed though it was on the Cincinnati platform, be a President sufficiently scrupulous as to the law of nations. We trust, for the sake of America and the world, that this will be the case. But still it is impossible not to recollect that there are men who aspire to the same exalted position which Mr. Buchanan has already attained, and who may consider the persistence in the same doctrines as an advantageous policy. More than one of these is connected with the present Government, and may prolong the irritation and bickering which have marked the existing Presidency. Such men as Jefferson, Davis, and Douglas have been the evil geniuses of President Pierce, and may, perhaps, bring equal discredit on the Government of his successor. We trust that Mr. Buchanan, now that he is placed in the highest office that an American citizen can fill, will rise to his position, and administer to the affairs of his country with firmness and independence of judgment. The power of an American President is perhaps beyond that of an analagous Minister in a Free State; he is a sovereign irremoveable during his term of office, and may, if he chooses, be practically his own Minister. We sincerely hope that he will understand the true interests of the land he governs, and that, as far as regards England, he will endeavor to preserve those feelings of mutual esteem and good will which, within the last few years, have grown up so largely between the two conntries.

Officers of an American Ship Fined for an Asssault.

Cases of outrage, says the London Times, on board American packet ships while on the high seas and in the river are of frequent occurrence. Not unfrequently seamen jump into the streams on the arrival of ships at this port in order to escape the brutality from the mates, and numerous cases are admitted into the hospitals in which men have been beaten within an inch of their lives. Several days during the past week Mr. Mansfield, the stipendiary magistrate of Liverpool, was engaged in the investigation of charges against Wm. De Courcy, mate, Woodward, second mate, and Miller, fourth mate, of the large American cargo ship Ocean Monarch; and the evidence disclosed a series of brutalities of the most dreadful and disgusting nature. It was ultimately decided that the part of the river in which the assaults occurred was in the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, before two of whom (Mr. Theakstone and Mr. Tinne) the defendants were brought. De Courcy, against whom six cases of assault were proved, was fined £5 each in two cases, £2 each in three cases, and £1 in the remaining case—in all, £17. Woodward was fined 40s. each and costs in two cases; and Miller was fined 40s. and costs in one case. The money was paid in each case.

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

The ship Cuban, of this port, Captain Galloway, says the North British (Glasgow) Mail, which arrived here from Demerara on Wednesday, met with an extraordinary adventure on her homeward voyage. About 9.20 p.m. of the 16th inst., when in latitude 43,49 N. long. 29.50 W., the ship, which was running before the wind at the rate of 9 1-2 knots an hour, received such a shock that she heeled over several strakes, and her way was completely stopped, while the men who were sleeping in the starboard berths of the top-gallant forecastle, were thrown out upon their chests. Shortly after the shock, an immense whale rose at a short distance from the ship's quarter, and after lying motionless for a short time, as if stunned by the blow, swam towards the vessel, as if with the intention of repeating the attack. It was a moment of intense anxiety on board; but, fortunately, when close to the stern, the monster wheeled round in the opposite direction, and dived, throwing with his tail, as he did so, a quantity of blood and water on board. It was a moonlight night, and the bulk of the huge animal could be seen distinctly towering to a considerable height above the surface. When he dived, his tail appeared to those on board, to be from 30 to 40 feet out of the water. The pumps were sounded, but the ship was found to be making no water. From the force of the blow, and the fact that he heard a whale blowing a short time before the shock occurred, it is supposed that the fish made a regular attack upon the ship, and was not come in contact with while asleep. An estimate of its immense size and power may be formed from the fact of its bringing to a stand still a deeply laden vessel of 500 tons, and sailing at a rate of nearly ten knots an hour.

The celebrated English Cotswold ram "Champion," which has taken prizes at all the leading agricultural shows in England, Ireland and Paris, weighs about 400 lbs.

"OUT WEST" CORRESPONDENCE.

State Fair—John Mitchel—Trip out West—Sale of the Delaware Reservation Lands—Speculators—Muster of the Squatter Sovereigns of Kansas—Appearance and Organization—Crowns and Regalia—Kansas—&c. &c.

We have had our State carnival of late, under the name of an "Agricultural and Mechanical Fair," at which, for five consecutive days, some thirty thousand daily visitors were congregated. The grounds being some three miles from the city, brought into requisition every species of vehicle into which, by an effort of contrivance, the means of sitting could be introduced; and so from the Town to the ground stretched a line of carriages, omnibusses, buggys, sulkys, rockaways, furniture vans, and baggage wagons, all crowded with "fair women and brave men," giving (if you could imagine the laughter and jaunting cars) a lively idea of the Donnybrook road in the olden fair time, from Leeson street bridge to Cold Blow lane. The Exhibition grounds cover some fifty acres, well enclosed, with some two hundred and twenty-six cattle stalls, various sheds and buildings for stock and machinery, exhibition rooms, &c., and ample apartment accommodation. The principal structure is the Amphitheatre, with a circumference of some twelve hundred feet, and capable of seating twenty thousand spectators (I write in the Age of Hoops) under cover; it is a permament structure, and the grounds will be used annually for a State fair.

* * * * * * * *

When having written the foregoing, some three weeks since, it so happened that I had to start for the West at an hour's notice, and left the Fair-grounds description mid-way—and as, in the present fast age, such dates are only tolerated for Indian and Australian news, I did not, on my return, venture to continue.

I had the pleasure of seeing John Mitchel on Monday last. He had delivered a lecture on Saturday to one of the largest and most intelligent audiences that ever assembled to hear a discourse in our city. As I had been assured by a gentleman who was present, I found Mitchel improved in bodily appearance since I last saw him—now eight years since—when I sat beside him in the pillar room of the Rotunda—on that stormy evening when resistance to the Search Act was discussed—and when, as he stood up to reply to an interrogatory of O'Gorman, I looked fixedly on him, and mentally concluded that, humanly speaking, he could not last a year. I believe firmly that the British Government saved his life by the worst intentions. He was invited to a magnificent dinner on Monday night by some fifty gentlemen, which (as you may predicate of any dinner partaken of by fifty sympathisers with the Confederates) was a most agreeable affair, and he has no doubt carried away with him a memory of the "Border Ruffians" which is altogether at variance with the ideas of his friend, Henry Ward Beecher.

At Fort Leavenworth, on the 17th inst., I had the opportunity of seeing the muster of the "Squatter Sovereigns of Kansas," the occasion was the "Sale of the Delaware Reserve Lands," about which, for some time past, serious fears of bloodshed were entertained; it being known that the sale would be by public auction to the highest bidder, which gave the outside speculator a chance to come in, and by his money take from the Squatter the land he had labored on through war and winter. In view of such a contingency the Squatters had organised thoroughly each Township, appointing a buyer and a "Squatter Court" to adjust conflicting claims, and determined to protect their right to the land, at Government appraisement, at any risk and against all odds. Approaching the time of sale, the speculators began to arrive in hundreds, so true is it "wherever the carcase is, there will the vultures be gathered together." On the boat on which I passed up the river there were some 180 passengers, the greater part of whom were going to attend the sale. On the 17th there could not be less than three millions of gold on the ground and an immense amount of subdued excitement. By this time, however, the speculators had concluded that it would not be safe to buy over the Squatters' heads, and consequently were reduced to the less profitable gambling of buying up claims. From many of those disappointed people you will have, no doubt, long letters in the Eastern papers when they get back, complaining that the professed openness of the sale was not guaranteed, and making strong appeals to constitutional rights and Abolitionism. The fact is, the sale was declared public and was so, and any man whose cupidity and conscience were equal had the privilege of bidding on a claim, nay of buying it—but that the enjoyment of it would fall to the lot of his executors was morally certain within twelve hours, and knowing this, fear supplied the place of honest feeling, and so he didn't bid.

Now, as to the Sovereigns themselves! You ask how did they look? They mustered some twenty-five or thirty hundred strong, and might be calculated on effectively delivering in 20 minutes twenty thousand arguments, warranted by Colonel Colt to be the most weighty and unanswerable in the range of logic. Those same Squatter Sovereigns were the most rugged, rough, royal, right-angled set of "ruffians" that I have ever seen; men to conquer a wilderness and found an empire; men to be respected for manliness and muscle, no less than for their rifle and revolver; men in whom all that is manly is emulated, and amongst whom more real chivalry would be found than on your entire seaboard, not excluding Virginia. You, ask "were they crowned?" Yes, Sir, their royal heads were graced with stovepipe, felt, and sombrero hats; coon, wolf, and squirrel caps, with composite styles, so various as to defy classification; and then, as mantles, there were white blankets, blue blankets, striped blankets, Indian blankets, bear-skin coats, stage coats, deerskin coats, hunting shirts, with home-spun pants, and cowhides, buckskin ditto, and Mocassins, &c. &c., all comprising the outer robing of the august assembly. In fact, it was a sight worth seeing, as those hardy pioneers poured into the Fort, and stood silent, but ready to assert, at any price, their undoubted right to the lands which their labor had subdued, and even Greeley would be constrained to admire them I doubt not, had he been there to see; nor must you for an instant suppose that when I use Greeley's term, "Ruffians", I mean anything more than a geographical distinction.

The seventh Township was the first sold, and sold at from $150 to $210 an acre. Owing to the organization no difficulties arose, except a feud between rival claimists, not involving loss of life, though it did of blood, as no speculator was fool-hardy enough to overbid the Squatter. Norman Eddy, the commissioner, made a well digested short speech, at the opening of the sale, which completely allayed an excitement that might have otherwise been serious. All political differences were forgotten, or rather set aside, in the common danger, and the "Ruffian" and "Beecherite" stood stoutly together, shoulder to shoulder, ready to "rub out" their mutual enemy, the land-shark. I do not pretend to say, however, that when the lands are perfectly secured by the Squatters that there may not be an occassional balancing of "old accounts;" and yet, now that Buchanan is elected,—Geary, Governor—and to fill a column of the electioneering matter of the Tribune—to 'kill a man in Kansas'—is not necessary, it is probable that there will be peace in the territory; and it should be—for the portion of the territory which I rode over (from Kickapoo to Leavenworth) is as beautiful a country as man could desire—picturesque as Wicklow, and in parts rich as the Valley of Sciota. I had intended giving some incidents, but find I have been already immeasurably prolix for one letter, and will, therefore, for the present, conclude—to take up, perhaps, in another letter—the thread of a Western Tour.

COSMOPOLITE.

St. Louis, Nov. 26, 1856.

American News.

Judge John C. Larue of this city, died suddenly at his residence on Magazine street, on the 10th ult. He had been in feeble health at intervals for years, but was recently much better than usual. The N. O. Picayune says, up to within a few minutes of his death he was comparatively well and in good spirits. The manner of hs death was as deeply touching as awfully sudden. His wife had been indisposed, and he remained home to keep her company. He lay on a low sofa, quite cheerful. She reclined along the floor, leaning on his shoulder, his arm about her—the child on the sofa, playing with its father. Suddenly the child asked abruptly, "Papa, what makes your eyes roll so?" and with a convulsive stretch he said to his wife, "My darling, I am dying." Not unused to spasms of illness, she answered, "Don't, dear—don't frighten me so." "I tell you," replied he, with emphasis, "I am dying." She started to get restoratives; he said "No, no." She rushed to the window, calling for servants, "A doctor! a doctor!" and turning saw his face distorted, and his hands clenched. His only words were, "No, no; let me die in peace!" when his face recovered a smiling expression, his limbs relaxed, and he breathed but two or three times again. Judge Larue was a native of New Jersey. He went to New Orleans about twenty-two or three years ago, and was engaged for some time as tutor in a family. He worked, at one time, as a printer, and early connected himself with the press in an editorial capacity. He was one of the early editors and proprietors of the New Orleans Crescent, and was a prominent candidate before the Democratic Convention for the office of Attorney-General, when Hon. Isaac E. Morse was selected. The Governor appointed him Judge of the First District Court.

The Adams Co. (Ohio) Democrat, Nov. 27, gives the following outline of a case of Lynch Law in Ohio:—On Friday night the house of Mr. Israel Morris, of Manchester, was broken into during the absence of Mr. M. The person of Mrs. Morris (who was alone with two small infants) was violated in the most shocking manner. When discovered next morning by the cries of the children, it was found that her jaw was dislocated, and otherwise injured to such an extent as to render her entirely helpless. When sufficiently recovered to speak, she said that in the conflict she had scratched the lip of her assaulter so that it bled freely. This led to the arrest of a brute Negro, named Bill Terry, who bore the mark upon his lip. An infuriated mob took him to the neighboring tree, and swung him by the neck until he confessed. He was then sent to West Union and confined. But the husband of Mrs. M. returning and learning the particulars of the crime, he aroused his friends, went to West Union, forced the jail, and returning with the Negro, swung him from a limb of a tree until he was dead.

Great excitement exists in Martinsville (La.) The Attapakas Register of the 22d ult. states:—We learn from a letter now before us, dated St. Martinsville, 18th ult., that the town has been thrown into great commotion by the intelligence that a servile insurrection had been detected, the object of which was murder and rapine. The day on which this nefarious project was to be put in execution was fixed for Christmas. The ringleaders, favorite family servants, have been arrested, viz: a mulatto boy belonging to E. Broussard, another to J. A. Bonnafon, and a third to Alcibiade Deblanc, besides many others in other sections of the parish. Strenuous efforts are being made to sift the whole plot, and bring the offenders to justice.

Gen. Persifer F. Smith, commanding the military department in the West, writes to the War Department, under date the 11th ult., that order and tranquillity have gradually resumed their sway in Kansas. The troops in the territory, with the exception of a squadron of dragoons and one company of infantry, who are to remain and guard the State prisoners, are henceforth to devote themselves to making preparations for a campaign against the Cheyenne Indians in the spring. The winter in Kansas has commenced with severity much earlier than usual.

The Banquet of the Democracy in Faneuil Hall, Boston, on the 3rd inst., in honor of the Presidential victory, was a joyous and interesting demonstration. The hall was finely decorated. The tables were bountifully spread, and the speeches and other exercises generally jubilant. Oliver Frost presided. Among the speakers were Hon. John S. Wells, Collector Peaslee, Col. J. H. George, B. F. Hallett, and several other prominent gentlemen.

The canal tolls for the season to the 15th inst., foot up $2,590,369, a deficiency, as compared with the same period in 1855, of $42,407.

All the prisoners in the Newcastle (Delaware) jail made their escape on the night of the 17th inst.

The Wheeling Times, (Va.) says: "A day or two since, some workmen engaged in subsoiling the grounds of Sheriff Wickham, at his vineyard in East Wheeling, came across a human skeleton. Although much decayed, there was not much difficulty in identifying it, by placing the bones which could not have belonged to other than a human body, in their primitive position. The impression made by the skeleton in the earth and the skeleton itself, were measured by the Sheriff and a brother in the craft locale, both of whom are prepared to swear that it was ten feet nine inches in length. Its jaws and teeth were almost as large as those of a horse. The bones are to be seen at the Sheriff's office."

It has been represented to the Post-Office Department that in many of the post-offices, particularly at the South, public documents are allowed to remain for weeks and months without being dispatched or delivered according to their address. Accordingly the Postmaster-General has issued stringent instructions on the subject, and such delinquency on the part of any postmaster, when reported to the Department, will be considered good cause for removal from office.

Charles Irving, of the Lynchburg Republican, it appears, took exceptions to an article in the December number of Harper's Magazine, written by Mr. Bagby of Lynchburg, and sent him a challenge. The parties went to Washington on the morning of the 3rd inst. Mr. Irving was accompanied by Messrs. Pryor, Bocock and Keitt, and Mr. Bagby by Messrs. W. C. Corrie and W. L. Blanchard. On the arrival upon the ground of the parties the matter was amicably and honorably adjusted without a shot.

The editor of a Western paper having lent his axe to one of his subscribers, the borrower unfortunately broke off the handle. On returning it the man said, "You can easily get it fixed." "Yes," replied the editor, "but that will cost at least a quarter of a dollar." "Well," rejoined the borrower, "if you ain't rather small for an editor; here's the quarter, but I'll thank you to stop my paper at once."

Joseph Mitchell a poor drunken representative of the Penobscot tribe, says the Bangor Journal of the 4th inst., was found drowned near Roberts' wharf, above the toll-bridge, and it is supposed he fell in the previous night in a state of intoxication.

Reports received in Washington from the United States Surveyor-General for Utah, show that he has made considerable progress in surveying the settled portions of that vast and troublesome territory.

We see by the Baton Rouge Advocate that Mr. T. H. Hatch has disposed of his interest, and his connection with the paper ceased, which will hereafter be carried on by John M. Taylor & Co.

The Pointe-a-la-Hache National understands that Mr. Louis Duvigneaud, K.-N. foreign orator, is about to abandon Louisiana forever, and suggests that the honorable gentleman should settle somewhere in his native Island, Hayti. The National cautions Mr. D. to beware of Soulouque, as that august personage is somewhat jealous of his authority.

The slave Rich, convicted at the last term of the circuit court of Tallapoosa county of the murder of Eli T. Pouncey, his master, suffered the extreme penalty of the law on the 19th inst. So says the Dadeville Banner.

An accomplished swindler bearing the name of D. N. Dobelman, has been arrested in Philadelphia, on account of information given by Mestayer & Pergeline, importers, of this city.

On the morning of the 3d inst., locomotive No. 143, attached to the milk train of the N. Y. and Erie railroad, when near Sufferns station, exploded, killing instantly G. W. Vance, the engineer, and severely injuring H. Carey, the fireman and two brakemen.

Theatres in New-Orleans are taxed by the State $200, by the city $315, and for the Charity Hospital $500—total $1,015 per annum. A petition is about to be presented to the legislature to reduce the amount.

The Trustees of the Brooklyn Collegiate and Polytechnic Institute will apply to the next legislature for an increase of their capital stock to $100,000.

Twelve city lots have been sold for the sum total of $14,322 50, in Janesville, Wis. Eight years ago they were purchased for three hundred dollars, which then was considered an enormous price.

A Yankee at Panama sought shelter at the American Consul's from an earthquake. He thought even the earthquake should respect our flag.

During a Democratic procession at Augusta, Ga., a spark from one of the torches set fire to a cotton bale and five hundred were destroyed.

The papers of Pittsburg suggest that a Convention of Delegates from the cities interested in the trade of the Ohio Valley be held, in order to agree upon a plan for the improvement of the river navigation which shall be satisfactory to all.

On the Rio Grande the crops are said to be fine, but some fears are entertained that the fields, immediately in that region, may be damaged by the overflow, as the second crop has not yet been gathered.

The Yazoo Banner is early in the field. It comes out with the names of Millard Fillmore and Willam L. Sharkey as candidates for President and Vice-President for 1860.

A gentleman in Norfolk, Va., has fifty hens that average twenty eggs per day, amounting to 7,300 per year.

The Postmaster of Plattsburg, Mo., was arrested and held to bail in $4,000, on a charge of opening a letter and communicating its contents.

Here is another case of Negro villainy:—"Abraham, a Negro, convicted in Onslow, N. C., of rape on a young lady, has been senteneed to be hanged on Friday, 28 inst."

The most spirited competition witnessed for some time in the Incumbered Estates Court, was that at the sales of Greenmount property in the county Louth, purchasing for Mr. Finlay Chester, by Mr. P. J. Byrne. Mr. Dease retired when the biddings reached £17,000. Mr. M'Clintock's solicitor and Mr. Byrne then continued the biddings till they reached £18,950, when Mr. Byrne bid £19,000, and the property was knocked down to him. Mr. Chester was warmly congratulated by a number of friends on his being declared the purchaser.

The Magistrates at the Cork Police have refused to accept bail for Minton and Russell D. Connell, the father and son charged with the recent frauds at the Cork Charitable Loan Bank. They were consequently committed to the city gaol, there to await their trial at the ensuing assizes.

On the night of the 11th ult., the infantry barracks of Clonmel was entered by some parties unknown, and a quantity of arms, powder, &c., stolen. The burglars having scaled the walls of the barracks with impunity, forced open one of the stores, and took away several bayonets and swords which had been deposited there since the general seizure for arms made in the district since the troubled time of '48; they also abstracted a quantity of gunpowder, and broke into the armory, from which they took five stands of arms, all of which were new and branded with the usual mark. The premises occupied by Captain Inman, the officer in command of the Pensioners' staff, were forcibly entered and the desk of his clerk rifled of some papers, but fortunately no money was left in it; but the burglars still further signalized their daring, for they broke open a strong chest in which were placed for security, some articles of soldiers' apparel, consisting trousers and Crimean shirts, and some of these were also taken away. No clue has been obtained for the arrest of the parties.

About five miles from Blesinton, says the Leinster Express, there lived a very poor and a very old man, by the name of Clare. Within this present month he "shook off this mortal coil;" he died and was buried; but between these two events there was an interval, during which the neighbors gave Paddy Clare "a dacent wake." Although poor Paddy Clare was never known to "fare sumptuously every day," or any day, his mortal remains nevertheless were "clothed in fine linen"—so fine, indeed, that one of these sheets attracted the particular attention of some of the mourners on the occasion. Accordingly, on the day of burial, the discovery was made that Mr. Clare's person and premises were totally relieved of the aforesaid very white sheet. Information charging a suspected party was duly sworn by a near relative; but to the present no clue has been made as to the whereabouts of "Paddy Clare's winding-sheet."

A meeting of the county Leitrim Liberal Club was recently held at Carrick-on-Shannon, at which about sixty members attended, including the Very Rev. Dean Dawson, and a large body of the clergy of the county. Dr. Brady, the liberal repre-representative of the connty, attended, having arrived from London, for the purpose. The Club adopted a series of resolutions pledging themselves to sustain the registries, so as to ensure the re-election of their present representative, to whom a vote of confidence was passed. After the meeting the Club dined, when covers were laid for sixty. Amongst the speakers at the dinner were the Very Rev. Dean Dawson, Rev. Mr. Curran, and Dr. Brady.

A Waterford paper states that about two hundred people had assembled to witness two men fighting in Patrick street. The Police were quickly on the spot, and on arresting one of the pugilists, they were at once interfered with by a man, named Hannigan, who caught the Constable making the first arrest, and held him so as to force him to let his prisoner go. The Constable then brought Hannigan to the Tower.

The number of students present at the recent matriculation examination in the Belfast Queen's College, is greater than last year. The number of candidates for matriculation in each of the three Colleges for this year, so far, are, Belfast, forty-six; Cork, thirty-six; Galway, twenty-nine. The entries, up to this date, in the Belfast College, are an increase upon last year. There were about 200 students on the College roll at the close of last year.

A number of tailors in Kilkenny on charge of Mr. Brennan have been convicted on a charge of striking work, and sentenced as follows:

The extensive stables of Chas. Branconi took fire recently in Clonmel, and suffered considerable damage.

It is certain that the Hon. Captain Bernard will put himself in nomination for the constituency represented by the late Lord Bernard, now Earl of Bandon.

At a late meeting of the Belfast Town Council, as reported in the Whig, the following amusing colloquy took place:

Mr. M'Geagh got up to address the council. He said, I wish to make a remark, in reference to a statement calculated to injure one of our public officers. It has been stated that Mr. Lindsay thought it not advisable to act on the authority of the Police Committee. I must state that this is calculated to injure Mr. Lindsay very much, if not contradicted. My impression is that Mr. Lindsay has never in any instance, refused to carry out the direction of the Police Committee. If an officer of the council refuse to obey the Committee under which he is placed, I, for my part, think he is not fit to be in the council. In reference to some remarks that has been made—

Mr. Rea—I call the gentleman to order; he should have said "have been made." (Laughter and confusion, amid which several members rose to their feet.)

Mr. Nelson—No; I say has is a better word. (Continued laughter and confusion.)

Mr. R. Lindsay—I call Mr. Rea to order, sir. (Great uproar.)

Mr. Rea—What I say is this, that the principle laid down at our last day of meeting should be carried out, namely, that a gentleman who cannot induce a verb to agree with its nominative case in number and person, should not presume to speak. It is very fearful to any person of a well regulated mind and possessing a nervous orrganization to hear a gentleman say—

The Chairman—Now, Mr. Rea—

Mr. Rea (continuing)—To hear gentlemen say, after repeated warnings, (laughter) that "remarks has been made." In this, the council-room of the Northern Athens, I protest against it.

Mr. R. Lindsay—I advise Mr. M'Geagh to disregard these attacks of Mr. Rea.

Mr. Rea—This is not the place to advise him.

Mr. Lindsay—I have to protest against our proceedings being turned into a burlesque. I have so protested before; but it seems Mr. Rea won't take advice. Now the more prudent course for Mr. M'Geagh to pursue will be not to notice this unbecoming interruption.

Mr. M'Geagh—I am very thankful to Mr. Lindsay for his advice, but—

Mr. Rea—You should be much more obliged to me for teaching you. (Laughter.)

Mr. M'Geagh—I have made up my mind not to notice the low dastardly attacks—

Mr. Rea—I call the speaker to order. (Cries of chair.)

Chairman—Mr. Rea, you must sit down.

Mr. Rea—He has used the word "dastardly."

Chairman—We'll adjourn if this is to go on.

Mr. M'Geagh—I shan't notice the miserable attacks.

Mr. Nelscn—Call him out. (Laughter.)

Mr. Rea—I'm ready. (Continued uproar.)

Mr. M'Geagh—Not being accustomed to speak in public, I might occasionally make a mistake; but in writing a letter, I never committed a blunder. (Great laughter.)

The old story, says the Limerick Observer of the 11th ult., of the fiddler who, in wading a ford, lost his fiddle, and was sympathised with by a friend who declared that "he pitied his case," and was answered that it wasn't the case he cared about at all, but the fiddle, was more than realised on Saturday in the New Docks of Limerick. An honest poor woman named Mary Ryan, who earns her bread as a basket-woman, at Newtown Market, was sent with a prime leg of mutton, which had been purchased by the captain of a ship at Mrs. Molony's stall, in the market, to be delivered at his vessel, lying in the docks. Having reached the dock, she cast about for the ship, but while engaged on this inquiry, the poor woman tumbled into the dock and sounded the depths of twenty feet of water. She was on the point of drowning, and had let go her hold on the leg of mutton, which went—not exactly "the way of all flesh," but directly to the bottom—when the accident was fortunately observed by Capt. Thornton, of the brig C. M. S., who instantly had a boat lowered and the poor woman was picked up as soon as she rose to the surface. On being brought on shore, every attention was paid to her, and the usual means of resuscitation were used by the dockmen, happily with effect, for after about an hour she recovered; and when she had acquired the power of articulation, the first words she uttered were—"Where's the leg of mutton?" which she repeated two or three times. At length the sailor who rescued her, losing all patience, exclaimed, "D—n the leg of mutton, isn't your life saved!" "What matter, agrah, isn't it paid for, and I'll have to make it good for Mrs. Molony, because, you see, she'll have to give another in place of it. The blessed God will protect me! But where's the leg of mutton? Arra wirra sthrue—I've lost my leg of mutton!" At length she was somewhat calmed down, and, forgetting the leg of mutton, she returned thanks to Providence for the preservation of her life.

At the last Mullingar fair there was a considerable number of buyers in the fair-green, and the price of horned stock and sheep ranged at an advance of fully 1*l* to 30s per head. The supply of horses was the largest ever seen in the town. Mullingar fair never presented so many first-class animals. I have been talking to all the veterinary surgeons that attended the fair, and they are not a few, and they declare that they never saw such a collection of magnificent animals. Weight-carrying hunters brought from 100 to 150 guineas, and in some few cases the price given exceeded the latter figure. The English dealers freely gave the price for really valuable animals, and few of the superior class of horses.

The following proprietors of drapery establishments in Waterford have, at the request of their assistants, consented to close their stores at 6 o'clock during the winter months:—Robertson & Ledlie, Hazleton, O'Donnell & Co., Campbell & Co., Murray, Tullis & Co., J. The amount collected at the different chapels of Limerick on one Sunday for the Christian Brothers was £2021.6s.8d.

REFLECTIONS AND SUGGESTIONS IN REGARD TO WHAT IS CALLED THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

BY ARCHBISHOP HUGHES.

From the Metropolitan Magazine for December.

It is complimentary to the liberal institutions of America, where no distinction of religious creed is recognised by the government, that there are more Catholic periodicals, of one name or another, published in this country than there are among the English-speaking Catholics of the whole world besides. Now, even in this country, the date of the origin of these Catholic periodicals, is within the memory of men who have hardly attained more than the meridian of human life.

A growth of periodical literature so rapid, may naturally be supposed to contain the tares as well as the wheat of laborious planting, and of a prematurely-expected reaping of the harvest.

Accordingly, there has been observable in the mode of conducting these periodicals, a certain amount of rivalship, involving, at the same time a very considerable amount of mutual hostility between one periodical and another, so that the benefits of religion which might have resulted from something resembling unity of purpose, and a right understanding of the principle of a Catholic press, have been so thoroughly neutralized, that it is becoming a question among its supporters, whether it has not already done more harm than good to the Catholic community.

The writer of this remembers when there was only one paper that could be classed—directly or indirectly—under the head of a Catholic journal, in the United States. It was published in New-York. It professed to defend the Irish character against obloquy, which was then as abundant as it is now. It was called the Shamrock. Incidentally, it was Catholic, in so far as the Irish were assailed, principally on account of their religion. This was succeeded—if the writer mistakes not—by the Truth-Teller.

The first really Catholic paper, and which happily survives, though but feebly supported, is the Catholic Miscellany, of Charleston, founded by the eminent Bishop England. Throughout all times this paper has sustained itself amidst great trials, with a dignity and erudition such as have not been surpassed by any Catholic periodical in the country. In the mere news department, it had little to offer that would be interesting to the Catholics of the North, except what would have been a repetition of matters with which they have been previously familiar. But in its editorial department—whether as regards the purity of the English language, the dignity of style, the force and at the same time elegance of argument—in dealing with an adversary, no Catholic periodical published in the United States, has yet surpassed the Charleston Catholic Miscellany.

Since then we have seen the rise of many Catholic journals, and the failure of more than a few. Those that survive, are before the mind and under the eye of the Catholic people of the United States. Without invidious comparison, it may be said, that each has its strong phase of merit, and its sinister aspects of possible injury to the cause which it professes, and by a confiding people is supported to advocate.

The only ground on which the writer of this paper would feel himself authorized to present his views in relation to the Catholic press, is a ground of zeal and interest for the universal harmony and union, not only in faith, but also in charity, of all the scattered members of the Church of God, who are to be found spread over the face of this now great empire, extending from the southern boundaries of Canada to the northern limits of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. These Catholics are not homogeneous in the order of natural birth, inasmuch as not all have been born in any one country; but they are homogeneous in the supernatural order, by which God has provided that they should be spiritually born into the ONE Church, which is not the church of any nation, but of all nations, without distinction—holy, Catholic, apostolical.

One of the greatest calamities that could fall on the Catholic people of the United States, would be, if allusions to variety of national origin should ever be allowed to distract their minds from that unity of hope and mutual charity which result from the communion of saints.

For some time past it has been observable that this so-called Catholic press has exhibited, especially in the North, divergencies well calculated to excite attention, if not alarm. On the one hand it has been assumed that the success of religion in this country depends on the continuous influx of emigrants, especially those of Irish origin, and that religion vanishes in proportion as the Celtic feeling dies out—that the national character of the American people, and more particularly as it affects the "first and second generation of emigrants," is hostile to the Catholic religion—that the best method of perpetuating the faith in this country, so far as the Celtic race is concerned, is to keep up and perpetuate a species of Irishism in connexion with the faith.

On the other hand, it has been assumed with equal confidence, but not on any better foundation, that our holy faith will labor under great disadvantages, and can hardly be expected to make much impression on our countrymen, until it can be presented under more favorable auspices than those which surround foreigners. In fact, that, if it were rightly understood, its principles are in close harmony with those of our constitution and laws—that it requires only a skillful architect to dove-tail the one into the other, and to show how the Catholic religion and the American Constitution would really fit each other as a key fits a lock—that without any change in regard to faith or morals, the doctrines of the Catholic Church may be, so to speak, Americanized—that is, represented in such a manner as to attract the attention and win the admiration of the American people. Now, in the opinion of the writer, the prevalence of either of these two systems would be disastrous to the cause of the Church.

The Church is not a foreigner on any continent or island of this globe. The Church is of all nations, and for all nations, as much as the sunbeams of heaven, which are not repudiated as foreign under any sky. In fact, truth, no matter by whom represented, is at home in all climes; and this not simply in matters of religion, but in matters of history, arts and science.

It may be admitted that if the twelve Apostles, when they carried the faith of Christ to the different nations, had been natives of the several countries in which they propagated Christianity, the success of their mission, according to the limited range of earthly wisdom, might have been greater than it was. But on the other hand, their success, the constancy of their testimony, and for the most part their martyrdom, gave evidence that they were men sent of God, and not sent by other men merely like themselves.

And so it has been. Those who had received the faith, carried it forth in their hearts and on their lips, under a divine commission, to those of other nations who had not as yet received it, bearing at the same time—as became witnesses for Christ—their lives in their hands. The Apostles were, by national origin, Jews; they became Christians by the grace of divine faith. They did not carry their Judaism to be established in other countries, but only their faith. And throughout the whole tenor of ecclesiastical history, this same order has prevailed. The faith once established, became, to a certain extent, indigenous in the several countries which had been the theatre of their labors.

But in the annals of Church history, there has never been a country which, in its civil and social relations, has exhibited so fair an opportunity for developing the practical harmonies of Catholic faith, and of Catholic charity, as the United States. Whoever would take the pains to examine how, under the influence of the Catholic principle, representatives of all nations have been blended into a unity, unexampled in the history of the world, need only trace the order of succession among the bishops and priests of the United States. Not to speak of the priesthood, if we confine our remarks to the episcopacy, the highest test under which nationalities could be profanely brought into comparison with Catholic sentiment and order, we may cite a few instances of the sees that have been longest established. The first bishop of Baltimore was an American. His coadjutor, who survived him but a short time, was also an American. The next bishop of that see was a Frenchman. His successor was an Englishman, and was succeeded by an American again, who in turn has been succeeded by an Irishman. The first bishop who lived to preside in the see of New-York was an Irishman. His successor was a Frenchman, and his successor is again an Irishman. The first bishop of Richmond was an Irishman; his succesor is an American. The first bishop of Cincinnati was an American, the second is an Irishman. The first bishop of St. Louis was a Frenchman, the second an Italian, the third is an Irishman. The first bishop of Natchez was an American; the second a Belgian. The first bishop of Charleston was an Irishman; the second an American. The first bishop of Louisville (formerly Bardstown) was a Frenchman; the second an American. The first bishop of Boston was a Frenchman—second and third Americans.

This is quite enough to show that the Church of God, in feeling as well as in faith, selects as vacancies occur, the prelate most likely to advance the kingdom of Christ, utterly regardless of such contemptible things, when they are foisted into the spiritual order, as nationalities. The first bishop of Nashville, of Wheeling, of Covington, of Erie, of Buffalo, of Albany, of Portland, of Newark, are all Americans by birth, and all of them, we may say, appointed by the unanimous suffrages of their seniors in the episcopacy, who forgot their own several birthplaces, in determining the most suitable prelates for these different sees.

If we turn our attention to the priesthood, it will be seen that neither pains nor expenses have been spared to train up and introduce into the sanctuary of the Church, such young men, natives of the country, as may have exhibited from time to time, apparent evidences of vocation to the sacred ministry. The bishops of foreign birth are precisely those who held this great purpose nearest to their hearts. The venerable bishop of Bardstown was very successful in his efforts to accomplish this object. The bishops of St. Louis were equally zealous, but perhaps not quite so successful. Indeed, the prelates of all parts of this country have labored with equal industry and zeal, to encourage vocations to the ecclesiastical state among the promising young men of the country.

Now, supposing the Catholics of foreign birth, the "first and second generation of emigrants," should or could go forth, following the course of the sun in search of the El Dorado of independent agricultural life, where every man might repose under his own vine and fig tree (that is, in case he should ever have a vine or a fig tree to repose under,) as poetically imagined in the organ of the Buffalo Convention, in its original thema, not in its discordant variations;—supposing all this, what then? Why, this: The bishops and priests of the Eastern, North-Eastern, and North-Western Dioceses, whether of native or foreign birth, will have, among other considerations, hardly Catholics enough left to keep the grass from growing green in the vestibules of the churches built by the departed "first neglected and second lost generation of emigrants." But then, on the other hand, the presence of foreigners having been removed, the bishops and priests will have ample time to address their ministry to those who are to the "manor born."

Now, in view of these facts, neither clergy nor laity can afford, as Catholics, to have any distinction drawn among them in our periodicals, as among natives and foreigners. In the Catholic Church there are no natives. There is the nativity of baptism subsequent to the natural birth. There is the adoption by grace of every soul, whether introduced into her communion during the period of infancy or in adult life. Neither are there foreigners in the Church of God—it is one Lord, one faith, one baptism.

It may be added, that something analagous happens in relation to the country itself. There is a civil or political nativity provided for by the laws, by complying with the conditions of which, those who wish to make this country their perpetual abode are recognized before the law as citizens; and the stigma, or calamity (if such it be) of having been born on foreign soil is thenceforward removed and wiped away.

If, therefore, the law of the land has blotted out the distinction between a native-born and a nationalized citizen, why should it be kept up in periodicals professing to be guided by the spirit and charity of the Catholic Church?

This is unbecoming. This is not Catholic. This ought to be left to our enemies. We shall still be weak enough when we shall be most intimately united for the purpose of resisting the hostile pressure from without.

The Catholics of the United States have been sorely tried, within the last few years, by the assaults made upon them on account of their religion. True, the sword of hostility seemed directed against foreigners; but when the occasion required, it was found double-edged. It has been said that previous to the breaking out of this feeling, what was considered to be, at least, a portion of the Catholic press, had given great offence to our Protestant fellow-citizens by its arrogant and sometimes insolent tone and invective. Here there is a mistake. The papers though advocating Irishism, to which this reproach would apply, were never recognized by the legitimate authorities of the Church as Catholic papers. But the Protestant community could not understand any such distinction. And whilst the conductors of such papers may have merited such a reproach in their imprudent and improper course, it conveys an indirect compliment, to the effect that Irish and Catholic must be one and the same. Within the last eight or ten years no small portion of this supposed Catholic press has been under the special guidance of editors born on the soil, but who had entered into the Church at a matured period of life. In dealing with their fellow-citizens on topics of religious controversy, dogmas of faith, doctrines, and even discipline, they have claimed the right and exercised it of speaking with a plainness, a frankness, a boldness in the ear of their countrymen which few persons trained from infancy in the Catholic Church would have felt warranted to employ. The spirit of the Catholic Church, is, indeed, a spirit of strength and energy—neither of which is impaired by the use of the most charitable language.

The divergency of views presented in some of these periodicals, and to which allusion has been made in a foregoing portion of this article, requires some little development. The actual condition of the Catholic Church in this country is a problem of deep interest not only to ourselves, but also to our co-religionists in Europe. Sometimes exaggerated views of the progress of religion in the United States are conveyed in our periodicals, so that our brethren in Europe become almost elated in view of the Church's anticipated triumph. Then, again, other accounts suggest only discouragement, and almost despair. We may take the following as a specimen of this latter misrepresentation. A paper, which is supposed to have considerable circulation both here and in Ireland, has recently published the following deceptive, if not malicious, statement:

(From the American Celt, Sept. 27.)

"We have concluded to transfer to our fifth page, the particulars of the late abominable prize fight, or man-slaughter, in the neighborhood of this city. We do so with feelings of deep disgust and humiliation. The names of nearly all the actors in that brutal conflict, suggest only too plainly their paternity. In New-York, as in San Francisco, Ireland, where the sheriffs of counties are this year wearing white gloves, to commemorate calendars without criminals—this same Ireland has here and on the Pacific the discredit of swarming the great cities with a horde of hardy, vulgar ruffians, unmatched in any former state of society. Most of these wretches are young men born here or in the English manufacturing towns, of Irish parents. Such was the notorious Sullivan, such was the Kelly in this last tragedy. Surely, surely, some one has a terrible account to give of our neglected first and lost second generation, in the English and American cities."

The author of the above remarks, which are at the same time insolent and untrue, seems disposed to whine over moral results which he himself had contributed in no small degree to bring about. If he had chosen, he might have selected many names of the first and second generation, against whom there is no reproach, but who, on the contrary, do honor both to religion and to the country which gave them birth. But the editor in question is a theorist; and he is in the habit of subordinating the fact of the case to the fancies of his mind. In statistics he will never boggle at a mistake of two or three millions in estimating the Celtic race on this continent. So, also, it suits his absurd idea to exaggerate, if, indeed, that were possible, the miseries of the Irish emigrants, as they may be found in the cellars and garrets of New-York. Now, the truth is best on all questions of this kind. That many of these emigrants have to undergo a certain amount of hardship and trial after their arrival in this country is unquestionable. But this is incident to their transition from one country to another. And it is but truth to say, that their abode in the cellars and garrets of New York is not more deplorable nor more squalid than the Irish hovels from which many of them have been 'exterminated.' And it is but truth to say that in their actual condition they are surrounded by appointments of civilization, and even the comparative comforts of a temporary home, which by no means await them, even in the contingency (which will never happen), that the philanthropy of a convention in Buffalo, should be able to pluck to the surface, from the fertile depths of Illinois prairies, a township to be called St. Patrick's. It is humiliating that an editor, professing to be a Catholic, should select infamous names, connected with infamous and brutal transactions, and fling them in the face of Ireland, and of the Catholic clergy in English and American cities as proofs that the second generation of Irish Catholics is lost. This we have already said is untrue. 1st. The names mentioned, by the writer's own showing, though they may be of Irish descent, are not of Irish birth. 2d. They could be counted at best, not as a fair specimen of the second generation, but as the lowest and most degraded exceptions in regard to its general character. 3d. We all know that Ireland itself has more than once furnished notorious characters of the same class—that is, bullies for the ring. 4th. We know that a generation, even in Ireland, the debris of the famine, was rapidly becoming a curse to the country, when the war with Russia presented an outlet which relieved the nation from the dangers of their presence. Again, we may add, that it is all nonsense for any writer to assume, or pretend, that there is nothing but piety and religion in Ireland. We would be the last to deny the hereditary constancy of the Irish people in clinging to their religion and practicing its precepts. But alas! it must be admitted that the same vices that prevail in this country are found also in the large cities of Ireland, and, indeed, in the large cities of all other countries, whilst, in proportion to the population, the aggregate of misery in those European cities is greater than it is here.

If the writer of the above extract had been pleased to look around him in the city of New-York, he could easily have discovered that neither is the first generation neglected, nor the second lost. He could have reported to his countrymen in Ireland or elsewhere, that within his own memory, and under his own eyes, colleges, seminaries, convents, schools, altogether ranging from the highest education to the very humblest elements of learning, have sprung up around him. He could have reported that within the same circle there are not fewer than two hundred ladies and gentlemen, the great majority of whom are devoted to God, in a religious life, who are directly or indirectly engaged in imparting Catholic instruction, blended with secular and useful knowledge. He could have reported that they have under their care an average of from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand Catholic pupils. This is mentioned inasmuch as the editor in question is on the spot, and he can verify the statement. Now, it is equally certain that efforts of a similar kind, perhaps even greater, have been going on in the large cities of England and America. And, yet, he has been pleased to overlook all this, and to wave the bad reputation of two or three ruffians, such as may be found in any country, in the face of Ireland, and of the clergy of the large cities of Europe and America, to prove that the first generation is neglected, and the second lost.

No doubt many are lost, but against this there is no infallible preventive in any country. The editor says that some one will have a terrible account to render. This account will not fall exclusively on any one individual. But the editor himself might reflect as to whether, in his publications of former times, he may not have contributed to the result he deplores and exaggerates. Has he any recollection of having warned the Catholics of both the first and second generation, against contributing one farthing towards the relief or restoration of our Holy Father, Pope Pius IX., lest, forsooth, our Protestant fellow-citizens might suspect Catholics of loving God and their Church more than he and Kossuth, and other pseudo-patriots, professed to love what they call liberty? But this is only one instance of the manner in which journalists, supported exclusively by Catholics, tamper with their principles, alienating them from the strict and simple observance of their religion, under the plea of making them freemen.

In reference to this topic of the actual condition of the Catholic Church in this country, it is necessary to make just discrimination, before arriving at fixed conclusions. That the Catholic religion has lost not a few of the first generation, and still more of the second, is undeniable. But is this the only country in which such things have happened? Are we not inundated with reports of apostasies in various parts of Ireland itself? We know the agencies by which these temporary apostasies are brought about. The progressive and awfully persuasive powers of star vation render even a false religion, which offers bread and bibles, less odious from day to day, to the wretched beings who have no alternative left but a choice between death and falsehood.

The loss to the faith in this country is of a somewhat analogous character. Among grown up and instructed Catholics, an instance of deliberate apostasy—that is, renouncing the Catholic faith, and professing some other nominal creed, is exceedingly rare. But in vast numbers of instances the parents of children, who had emigrated to this country, died before they were able to make any provision for their unhappy offspring. In other instances, they lived or rather languished, under the trials incident to their condition, without having the ability to imbue the minds of their children with the principles of Christian doctrine

The consequence has been, that these children, taken charge of by the public, grew up entirely ignorant, and sometimes ashamed of the creed of their fathers. Under similar circumstances, similar results would occur in any country; and no one who is impartial, will for a moment pretend that results of this kind are necessarily an evidence of the withering influence which some of our Editors suppose to be exercised on the growth of Catholicity, by the civil and political institutions of the United States. There is a sense in which the Church may be said to have lost those children, but a truer form of expression would be to say, that she had never gained them—inasmuch as the Providence of God permitted that they never had an opportunity of knowing their religion. Consequently, in their case, there has been no such thing as a renunciation of the doctrines of Catholic faith, with which it was their misfortune never to have been acquainted.

If, on the other hand, we turn our attention to what would be a much truer test of the progress of the Catholic religion, there are abundant evidences to show that it is not retrograding. If we can point to instances in every State, in every diocese, almost in every parish, so-called, in which Protestants of the most cultivated minds, most unblemished personal characters, have borne their testimony, actuated necessarily by the grace of God, to the overwhelming evidences of the truth of the Catholic religion; if this testimony has not been in theory only, but reduced to practice, by their renouncing doctrines in which they had been reared, and embracing those of the one, holy, Catholic and apostolic communion, at the sacrifice of temporal interests, of long and cherished friendships, rising by that same grace of God superior to the tyranny of human respect; then who will say that our religion is not making progress in the United States, or that there is essentially anything in its requirements incompatible with the genius and feelings of the American people? Compare these witnesses, who in mature life bear such testimony to the truth of the Catholic religion, which they embrace, with the alleged falling off of the unfortunate offspring of emigrants or others, who really never had an opportunity of knowing what that faith is, and who consequently never could, as a moral act, renounce it, and the impartial reader will be enabled to judge, so far as the power and honor of the Catholic religion are concerned, how the balance might be adjusted between loss and gain.

Now it is certain, that the converts to the Catholic faith in the United States are very numerous, and, in point of respectability, many, if not all of them, entitled to rank in the first class of American citizens—natives of the soil.

Should we not, in gratitude to God, but in deep humility at the same time, feel great satisfaction at this result? These persons give a species of worldly standing to our religion, which, however, its Divine Founder did not leave to be dependent on the great ones of the earth. Among professional men, officers of the army and of the navy, lawyers, physicians, jurists, geologists, merchants, &c., &c., including a very considerable number of Protestant clergymen, the Catholic Church has welcomed to her fold, and taken to her bosom, no small number of distinguished converts. Among them, one of the earliest and most universally known, is the learned Doctor Brownson, editor of our only Catholic Review on this continent. His reputation as a writer, is European as well as American; and whilst he in his zeal is sanguine of hope, that the predispositions of his countrymen, whom he knows well, are especially adapted to the reception of the Catholic religion, we fear that the reality will not correspond with the anticipation. That the great mass of the American people are actuated by a general sense of justice, or perhaps what might be better expressed by the words "fair play," towards Catholics and their religion, is most freely and cordially admitted. That there is anything especial in the national character of the country, predisposing it to direct sympathy with our holy faith, is a proposition, the evidences for the belief of which, history has hitherto concealed. But, unfortunately, history has brought to light, in one place or another, all over the country, instances which prove but too well that the American people have inherited, even in their political freedom, the prejudices of their ancestors. Convents have been burned down, and no compensation offered to their scattered inmates for the injustice done them, or by way of repairing the broken faith of a Sovereign State, that had assumed to protect them in their legitimate rights of life and property. Catholic Churches have been burned down, while whole neighborhoods have been, under the eye of public officers, reduced to ashes. People have been burned to death in their own dwellings, or, if they attempted to escape, have been shot down by the deadly messenger of the unerring rifle. Crosses have been pulled down from the summit of God's sanctuary. Priests have been tarred and feathered. Ladies have been insulted for no crime, except that of having devoted themselves to the service of their Divine Master in a religious state, in the hope of conferring aid or consolation on their fellow-beings.

These things are undeniable—they are history. God forbid that we should implicate the great mass of our fellow-citizens in the dishonorable responsibility of such transactions as these. They were the works of what is called mobs; and mobs occasionally carry out their lawless and violent purposes in all countries. But we confess our disappointment at not having witnessed a prompt and healthy true American sentiment in the heart of the community at large, in rebuke of such proceedings, and, so far as reparation was possible, in making it to the injured parties whom they had failed to protect.

The learned editor of the Review, so far from being discouraged at this gloomy prospect pictured forth by one or two others in regard to the prospective decline of the Catholic religion from the period when European, especially Irish emigration, shall have ceased, or been sensibly diminished, is, on the other hand, buoyant in his anticipations of the progress which the Church is destined to make as soon as she is more generally and more widely represented by natives of the soil, and less so by foreigners, who, indeed, in a worldly point of view, must appear under disadvantages.

If one portion of what is called the Catholic press insist upon it, that our holy religion is mainly dependent, or destined hereafter to depend upon foreign, even Irish emigration, we must look upon such notions as a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. Emigrants arrive on these shores under the infallible destiny of dying out and leaving no successors, except such as may descend on our wharves day by day from the ship's side. To suppose that the Celtic race can perpetuate a Celtic posterity on this continent, is just as absurd as to imagine that the grains of wheat which had ben hermetically sealed in the cerements of an Egyptian mummy for two, three, or four thousand years, without the extinguishment of natural life, "according to its kind," and transplanted to this land, even in our own day, confided to the fertile soil by the expectant husbandman, should produce in his fields an Egyptian crop instead of an American harvest. We would beg, therefore, all Catholic editors to leave out any anticipation or speculation in regard to the perpetuation of any specific race within these United States. So far as we are Catholics, and especially Catholics born under British domination, we had no country until we arrived on these shores.

By the British constitution, we were entitled by natural birth to the full protection of its laws; but the very laver of regeneration which wiped away the stain of original or actual sins, was construed by that intolerant government—crime enough to sink us into degradation. So that the rights to which we are entitled by natural birth were being washed away, whilst the soul was being cleansed from defilement by the rites of our baptism.

We have renounced British domination, and thank God, the gates of a country which professes to acknowledge the equality of men have been thrown open to us.

But it does not follow that we have renounced, or that our posterity ever shall renounce the fidelity which we owe to God and our Holy Faith, and in the assertion of which we are warranted by the American Constitution.

On the other hand, the anticipations of some zealous Catholics who are not of Celtic origin, appear to us, and we make the avowal with regret, too sanguine in regard to the future success of the Catholic Church in the United States. Among these is Dr. Brownson. In the last number of his Review is found the following paragraph:—

"When the end we have to consult is not simply to hold our own, but to advance, to make new conquests, or to take possession of new fields of enterprise, we must draw largely upon young men whose is the future. These Catholic young men, who now feel that they have no place and find no outlet for their activity, are the future, the men who are to take our places, and carry on the work committed to us. We must inspire them with faith in the future, and encourage them to live for it. Instead of snubbing them for their inexperience, mocking them for their greenness, quizzing them for their zeal, damping their hopes, pouring cold water on their enthusiasm, brushing the flower from their young hearts, or freezing the well springs of their life, we must renew our own youth and freshness in theirs, encourage them with our confidence and sympathy, raise them up if they fall, soothe them when they fail, and cheer them on always to new and nobler efforts. O, for the love of God and of man, do not discourage them, force them to be mute and inactive, or suffer them, in the name of Catholicity, to separate themselves in their affections from the country and her glorious mission. Let them feel and act as American citizens; let them feel that this country is their country, its institutions their institutions, its missions their missions, its glory their glory. Bear with them, tread lightly on their involuntary errors, forgive the ebullitions of a zeal not always according to knowledge, and they will not refuse to listen to the counsels of age and experience; they will take advice, and will amply repay us by making themselves felt in the country, by elevating the standard of intelligence, raising the tone of moral feeling, and directing public and private activity to just and noble ends."

We confess our inability to comprehend or appreciate the meaning of this paragraph according to the words in which it is expressed. The Catholic young men of this country have had, so far as we know, every opportunity to realize the ideal of the eloquent Reviewer. And it is a matter of great consolation to know that hundreds of them, even in this city, are co-operating in various ways to correspond with the programme laid down in the foregoing remarks. Many of them belong to pious associations, Rosary societies, the admirable association of St. Vincent de Paul, and other devout sodalities. But when, or where, or by whom, they have been hindered from doing the work assigned them, or had the "flower brushed from their young hearts," is quite a secret and a mystery to us. We are equally in the dark as to any reason why the distinguished Reviewer should use in the depths of his zeal, the following solemn and emphatic language: "O, for the love of God and man, do not discourage them, force them to be mute or inactive, or suffer them in the name of Catholicity, to separate themselves in their affections from the country and her glorious mission." We cannot imagine after a retrospect of nearly forty years, when, or where, of how, or by whom, any thing has been brought about which would warrant this almost awful ejaculation. But no matter, it is a relief and a consolation to believe that one who knows his country and his countrymen as well as Dr. Brownson, should cherish such hopeful anticipations of the future, in regard to the Church of God. We could hope, but we cannot say, that we believe the general picture which he has drawn can be realized.

We regret exceedingly that many persons, at least so we have been told, are dissatisfied with some of the views put forward by Dr. Brownson. And we would regret it the more, if in reality he had given occasion for this dissatisfaction, by viewing the whole question from what might be called an original stand-point. At all events, there is this to be said, that if we have Catholic writers at all, their heads, their thoughts and their pens must be guided, not by another but by themselves, in their individual capacity, and under their indivinual responsibility. It may be added farther, that the liberty of the press on all subjects is not to be questioned in a country like this. At the same time, there is a censorship in this as well as in other nations. The difference is that in other countries the censorship of the press through the medium of government agents, is exercised, in general, previously to, or simultaneous with, the publication of an article—here it comes after. There it is the judgment of an individual who acts under state authority—here it is the censure of many individuals acting each one under the dictation of his own private judgment. Catholic editors, therefore, need not be surprised if, when they trespass too largely on the feelings of their subscribers, the circulation of their periodicals should be occasionally abridged.

We should be exceedingly sorry if anything of this kind should occur in the case of Brownson's Review. It is known to himself, at least, that many of his articles have not been such as to merit our poor approbation. But we are told by astronomers that there are spots on the sun. And, if he has written some things that might be offensive, he has written many others that are destined to perish never. When he and all of us shall have been consigned to the dust, those who are to succeed us will go forth among the pages of his Catholic Review, "prospecting," as they say in California, for the best "diggings." Nor will they be disappointed if they have tact and talent for philosophical, literary, and religious "mining."

But even should all other portions of his works pass away, there is one declaration of his that the writer quotes from memory, which is destined to be quoted throughout Christendom, just as long as the declaration of Fenelon on a certain occasion, when he condemned some of his own writings, because they were disapproved by the head of the Catholic Church. The circumstances and the persons differ from each other in several respects. Fenelon was an Archbishop; Brownson was a layman. Fenelon had condemned what he had written,—nothing that Brownson has written has been authoritatively condemned; but the declaration to which we have referred, and which is imperishable, was the gratuitous proclamation from Brownson's own pen, when he embraced the Catholic faith—when he had already acquired a philosophical reputation sufficient to make a proud man vain, he did not hesitate to give an example of humility, that will be an edification to the Catholics of future ages as well as of the present, in stating that he "had brought nothing into the Catholic Church except his sins." Now there is no great eloquence in this language. It amounts to a mere truism, because whether it be an infant of three days old or the adult convert to the faith, it is all the same.

We have other nominally Catholic papers published in New-York—one being what is called the Archbishop's organ. Of course it is to be assumed that the Archbishop's organ can never be out of harmony with all that is advantageous to Catholicity. And yet it has not been faultless. One thing, however, we must say, that during a period of several years when the mania of revolution and red republicanism was prevalent all over Europe extensively sympathised with by many of the people of this country, the Freeman's Journal never deviated from the principles of justice, and truth, and order, and social interests; and that, in fact, events have justified its course and foresight. There is another paper called the Irish American. If you should meet an "Irish American," and an "American Celt," side by side on the public way, you would be exceedingly puzzled to distinguish between them, they look one so much like the other—but especially the Celt.

There is this difference, however. The American Celt is a man determined to battle his way through life in this country; and to perpetuate his race, with its instincts and habits, through all future times. The Irish American, on the contrary, thinks that plausibility is the best policy which emigrants can adopt in this land. He and his partner, though of different creeds, are still of the same country. He makes known, from time to time, for the edification of his readers, that they never quarrel on the subject of religion, and the moral of his editorial would be "Go, thou and do likewise." He does not say that there is a sufficient amount of religion between him and his partner to quarrel about. But whenever some nasty bigot writes a scurrilous article, lampooning the Catholics in all the relations of life, our Irish American is sure to claim a little space in the vulgar newspaper that has published the insults, and then there is nothing more adroit than the manner of his approach. An idea of his communications may be formed from the following imperfect imitation:

Sir: I read your article against the Catholics. I regret deeply that you haven't a better opinion of us. And now, with profound respect, I would humbly beg leave to say, that I am a Catholic, though my partner is a Protestant; that I do not believe what you have said about our religion, and that I really am sorry that you have not a more kind and charitable opinion of us. (Signed) Editor of the Irish American.

A letter like this awakens a response from the calumniators of the Catholics, through the columns of this vile newspaper which had elicited the communication. So that the whole business becomes a double advertisement. The response will be to the effect that the Irish American is a very sensible man, entirely disabused of the errors of the religion which he professes—emancipated from all the superstitions of his creed, and the control of his clergy. In short, if all Catholics were like an Irish-American, the people of this country could get along with them.

The heading of our article implied that we should offer suggestions as well as reflections in regard to what is called the Catholic Press. This we shall do with much diffidence; but so far as depends on us, with a determination that they shall not be disregarded, at least in reference to the spiritual interest of our own diocese, and of the people committed to our care.

1st. We advise that Catholic periodicals abstain from every thing having even a tendency to infringe on the regular ecclesiastical authority by which God has been pleased to appoint that His Church should be governed. That they shall not presume to draw odious comparisons between the clergy of one section of the country and those of another; that they shall not arrogate to themselves the position of oracles or umpires, to decide where is merit and where is demerit; that they shall not single out a clergyman for premature panegyric simply because he is a patron of this or that journal, whilst they pass over in silence other clergymen, men of oftentimes more than equal worth. In short, that they be careful with regard to every topic of this kind.

2. We respectfully suggest that if they are religious papers, Catholic doctrine and the politics of the country be not blended together in the same columns; for too many of them have exhibited great industry in scattering the seeds of Catholic doctrine in the spring-tide, and, unfortunately for the honor of the creed which they profess to serve, have been seen with equal industry among the reapers, not of religion, but of politics, in the time of harvest. Of course, individually, editors as well as clergymen have a full right to cherish and express and exercise their political opinions in regard to all public questions. But a political paper ought to cling to its profession; and we say the same of a religious paper, especially a Catholic journal. If it be a Catholic journal, political partizanship should be scrupulously excluded from its columns. It is only when these papers exhibit a disposition to realize an amphibious life—now Catholic, and now political—that they become dangerous in the estimation of the American people, who cannot, it appears, get over the notion, that because they are partly Catholic, their politics are suggested or dictated by the ecclesiastical authorities of the Church.

3. We would say that the Church has no politics; that an editor, in his department, even whilst professing to promote the interests of religion, should remember the immense responsibility attached to his position. It is much greater than that of the merchant who deals in material things.

And, finally, that the Catholics of New-York and the United States, are bound by every sacred obligation, which they naturally owe to each other, to their families, to their pastors, to the the whole Church of God, to frown promptly and indignantly upon any newspaper that attempts, whether intentionally or not, to sow discord among them. This we know to be their own feeling in the diocese of New-York. The pastor of a congregation may be of one nation—his flock composed of several. Can they afford to be divided from each other, or to have the apple of discord thrown among them? A great number of Catholic families are of mixed origin, so far as natural birth is concerned. The husband was born in one country, the wife in another, and the children perhaps in another still. Can editors, professing to conduct Catholic papers, be permitted to infuse mutual distrust and discord into such peaceful and affectionate domestic circles, so as to excite prejudice in the minds of the children against their parents, or in the minds of the parents against their children? In brief, are the union, happiness, charity, family ties of a united Catholic people to be disturbed, or even trifled with, at the discretion, or rather indiscretion, either of this editor or of that other? We trust not. The Catholic people have it in their own hands to keep their editors in the straight way—at least so far as the interests of religion and the peace of the Catholic community are concerned. And the time may not be far distant when it will be their duty to exercise this power, by withdrawing their support from any paper, the moment it shall have given circulation to doctrines calculated to impair the Christian charity and mutual support, without distinction or comparison, by which the faithful of this diocese have been so long and so happily held together.

It has not escaped the observation of reflecting men, that during a recent period of very considerable political excitement, the Catholics, as a body, have borne themselves with great moderation and dignity. They are increasing in numbers, increasing in wealth, increasing in intelligence, and may we not believe and hope that they are increasing also in piety and attachment to their religion? They take but an abstemious part in the great questions which have threatened the disruption of the country. They have entire confidence that the general wisdom and patriotism of the American people, will be quite sufficient to preserve the Constitution and the Union of the States, and to maintain those principles of civil and religious equality, for which their noble and heroic ancestors made such ample (and in their intention) everlasting provision. † John Hughes,

Archbishop of New-York.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1856.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The most important documents, now-a-days, grow old in a week. From this premature deterioration the manifestoes even of the White House are not exempt. We are unwilling, however, to permit the last message of President Pierce to be placed in the archives of the past, without recording in these columns our admiration of the spirit which pervades it, and the gratification occasioned by the intelligence which on so many subjects of public interest it imparts. We are very naturally desirous, too, of rendering every volume we publish as complete a chronicle of the national transactions as it is in our power to make it, and the absence of any due mention of the document in question would be a serious defect.

A considerable portion of it is devoted to the exposition of the great constitutional question involved in the contest which, after so much excitement and alarm, fortunately terminated in the election of James Buchanan to the Presidency. A clear, forcible, most masterly vindication of the doctrine of the sovereign equality of the several States, is closed with a severe rebuke to those by whom the validity of that doctrine was menaced during the campaign.

In a dispassionate review of the position occupied in the late contest by the Northern States, the message truly shows—notwithstanding the unceasing and acrimonious statements of fanatics to the contrary—that these States have never assumed or arrogated for the Federal Government the power to interfere directly with the domestic concerns of the Southern States. However such an assumption may be recommended by parties who seem to glory in exhibiting themselves as unconscious of any law and outside the pale of allegiance to any government, it is a noble fact that the Northern States have not only disavowed such intentions, but, as the President states, have shrunk from conspicuous affiliation with those few who pursue their fanatical objects avowedly through the contemplated means of revolution. Many estimable citizens have allowed themselves to be overcome by the sophistical philantropy and rebellious benevolence of these parties, and after participating in the evanescent notoriety of the unconstitutional, and therefore untenable political fantasies of the hour, have taken anxious refuge in the sanctuary of the Constitution.

The strength of the Democracy at the eleventh hour—the complete triumph of law and order based on a sacred reliance in the principles of that document—principles which encircle the Union like a jewelled zone—was shown at the late election in a manner which is now creating astonishment in Europe, as it had done in America, on the 5th of November.

The secret of the Democratic triumph lay as much, probably, in the wild dogmas by which its conservatism was opposed as in its own brawny solidity, and of this truth the healthy national vigor of the President's Message gives conclusive proof.

Of the last Abolition Agitation the President laments that the theatre of operations was Kansas, and that the fight was carried on at the expense of the peace and happiness of the people of that territory. Kansas was made the battle-field—remarks the President—not so much of opposing factions or interests within itself as of the conflicting passions of the United States. Revolutionary disorder in Kansas has its origin in projects of intervention, deliberately arranged by certain members of that Congress which enacted the law for the organization of the Territory. And when propagandist colonization of Kansas had thus been undertaken in one section of the Union, for the systematic promotion of its peculiar views of policy, there ensued, as a matter of course, a counter-action with opposite views in other sections of the Union.

As a clear, acute and vigorous history and analysis of the political difficulties which have divided the people of the Union, this Message is entitled to particular praise, and will command the attention of posterity. As a bold and statesmanlike rebuke of the factionists, the Democratic party must be proud that such a document emanated from so eminent a representative of its faith; and for the very same reason the opposition cannot forget the power by which they have been chastised.

Topics of minor interest, touching pending negotiations with England, France, Denmark, &c., meet with due attention, and the chief suggestions of the Secretaries of the various Departments are stated with precision. As we devote considerable space to an exposition of those documents we take leave of the President's clear, forcible, and patriotic Message.

THE FRENCH REFUGEES AND THE EMPIRE CLUB.

As we write, a meeting is being held in the Hall of the Empire Club to take measures for giving a proper reception to the French Refugees who have recently escaped to this country from the pestilential climate of Cayenne. We trust that some substantial manifestation of the Democratic sympathy of America with the victims of European despotism will spring from the movement. Irish Exiles have been publicly honored in this country to the neglect of brave and gallant men of other nations who have fought, and bled, and suffered more in the great cause of freedom. We, therefore, the more heartily co-operate with the movement, and congratulate the Empire Club, by their tendering the use of their Hall, upon their prompt and cordial recognition of the claims of those sufferers to such an American reception as will be to them an honorable testimonial, and a national rebuke to the despotisms of Europe.

REPORTS OF THE SECRETARIES.

The Reports of the Secretaries form the fundamental history of the Republic. Those presented to us now are exceedingly able and interesting; and are highly creditable to the Cabinet as a body. They evince patient labor in the collation, and distinguished ability in their perspicuous arrangement. It is needless for us to reprint them entire, but as it is necessary that every good citizen should be acquainted with the actions of the Government to which he owes allegiance, we give a succinct review of all—an index rather by which the reader may refer to the original documents.

The Report from the Department of State being devoted chiefly to the correspondence, referring to Kansas, does not present any features or facts with which the general reader is not acquainted. We pass on to the other Departments.

INTERIOR.

The Report of the Secretary of the Interior, owing to the extensiveness of the duties coming within his Department, presents a variety of interesting topics. As an illustration of the amount of business in this office, it is stated that the records of correspondence for the year, relating to land surveys, cover ninety thousand folio pages. From the Report we learn that the quantity of land, exclusive of School Sections, surveyed since the last Report and up to the 30th Sept., was 16,873,699 acres. The quantity of land sold for cash during the last fiscal year is 9,227,878 acres, for which the sum of $8,821,414 was received; located with military scrip and land-warrants, 8,382,480; swamp lands approved to the States, 6,036,874; granted for railroad purposes, 15,680,865: making a total of 39,328,108 acres.

The land system has been extended with great success and rapidity along the whole Pacific slope, embracing California, Oregon and Washington Territories, and into Kansas, Nebraska, New-Mexico and Utah. This immense geographical surface has been organized into six new surveying departments. During the past four years there have been sold for cash 30,935,174 acres, for which there has been received $27,940,151; located for military bounties, 15,806,260; approved under swamp-land grants, 30,190,056; and granted for railroads, 17,036,282: making the aggregate of 93,976,772 acres, disposed of by direct grants. To the 25th November, 1856, there have been 265,268 applications under the recently enacted Bounty-land laws; 239,726 have been examined; 182,070 allowed and warrants issued covering 22,003,290 acres; 57,656 have been suspended or rejected, which is leaving 25,542 not yet examined.

The Secretary considers indigence the only true basis for a pension, and recommends that power be given to the Commissioner of Pensions to suspend, curtail or stop pensions when the reason for granting them has partially or totally ceased. On the 30th June, 1856, the number of Pensioners were 13,932; the amount disbursed to them, $1,360,694.

2,255 patents have been issued by the Patent Office since the 1st of January. The income of the office this year will be about $200,000.

Mr. McClelland again calls attention to the extraordinary expenses of the Judiciary, and earnestly recommends a radical change or modification of the laws relating thereto.

TREASURY.

The Report of Mr. Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury, exhibits the following facts:—

Income of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1856, from Customs, Public Lands, and other sources	$78,918,141
Expenditures of the Government:
On Civil List	$25,274,330
Interior Department	3,872,827
War	16,948,197
Navy	14,077,047
Total ordinary	$60,172,401
Redemption Public Debt	12,776,391
Total expenditure	$72,948,792
Balance in Treasury July 1, 1855,	$18,931,976
Same balance July 1, 1856	19,901,825
The Public Debt, March 4, 1853	$69,129,937
Subsequently added for Taxes	2,750,000
Together	$71,879,937
Paid off since 4th March, 1853	41,142,808
Leaving present debt only	$30,737,129

The Indian treaty obligations which are irrespective of the public debts noticed, and exclusive of permanent annuities, amount to $21,065,591. The Foreign Trade for the fiscal year is—

In Exports	$326,964,918
Imports	314,639,942
Balance in favor of the United States	$12,824,976

The increase in the Foreign Trade, afforded $4,937,625 in customs revenue over the previous estimates.

The Secretary makes a most suggestive return stating that $1,407,518,894 is invested in the capital and debt of the United States, the separate States, 113 cities and towns, 347 counties, 985 banks, 75 insurance companies, 360 railroads, 16 canals and 15 miscellaneous corporations, from which he has returns, and that of this amount $202,922,937 is held by foreigners. From 1825 to 1856 inclusive, the cost of building, fitting and repairing Custom Houses, amounts to $9,116,987; revenue cutters, $7,670,045, and collection and other expenses attending the revenue service, $48,299,168.

The losses to the Government by failures and defalcations are $23,898,952, from the foundation of the Government, of which $6,213,345 is hopelessly lost by the death of the parties, without effects. The outstanding claims are equal to about one and a quarter per cent. on $1,886,136,014 received into the Public Treasury, or five-eighths of one per cent. on the receipts and expenditures.

Having failed to secure the production of domestic wool, Mr. Guthrie recommends a revision and repeal of the duties on that article. The Secretary argues for an extension of the Free List, for the remission of raw materials and a reduction on some other of the present schedules, believing such would beneficially increase the employment of our tonnage and the markets for our own manufactures. He recommends the withdrawal of the small-note currency as the best measures of "approximating a metallic medium," and upholds the levying of duties by ad valorem in opposition to the former system of specific valuation. He also calls the attention of Congress to his previous suggestion for a revision regulating the collection of revenues; and doubts the propriety of the Federal Government standing in the relation of creditor to any of the individual States which have failed to pay the interest on their bonds.

WAR.

The Secretary of War reports the successful termination of difficulties with all the Indians on the Western plains, excepting the Cheyennes, and the close of the Indian War on the Pacific. Much space is devoted to a reviewal of the present incomplete system of carrying on war with the Indians. Small posts are condemned as nearly powerless beyond their own limits. Being fixed points in the route of the emigrant, they afford the Indians an opportunity of observing the trains, and of thus determining on future operations. The present system also involves the frequent construction and abandonment of posts, and the employment of all the troops for a length of time at a labor, alike injurious to military instruction and the contentment of the men. A fort is scarcely made comfortable until the soldier has to leave it. To rectify these misfortunes and overcome to some extent the expense, embarrassment, and comparative uselessness of locating military posts in advance of settlement, Mr. Jefferson Davis suggests that within the fertile regions a few points accessible by steamboats or railway be selected, at which large garrisons be maintained, which could annually supply strong detachments for the Indian country, to be sent out when grass will suffice for the support of draft and burden. Such an arrangement he believes would insure the strength of the service and make it attractive.

The Report reviews the progress of the sea-coast fortifications and urges the importance of their immediate completion. Mr. Davis asks for a law for appropriations on a liberal scale for new forts, improvements in small arms, and the accumulation of munitions of war. He holds that in time of peace we should prepare for war. Under the present Congressional appropriations it would take forty years to supply each mounted piece at the forts with one hundred rounds of ammunition.

The Secretary's recommendation for a national foundry for casting guns, is renewed. Among the leading suggestions made for the further efficiency of the War Department, are the following: Increased pay to officers; a renewal of former recommendations, having in view a retired list of disabled officers; the establishment by Legislature of different rules, determining rank and command; and a legislative remedy for the frauds made by the continual enlistment of minors; and that pensions be provided for the widows and orphans of officers and soldiers the same as in the navy.

In view of the rights of the Hudson's Bay and Puget's Sound Companies being held by persons owing no allegiance to the Republic, but whose influence for evil over the Indians is unbounded, the Secretary recommends the extinguishment of these rights. The movements of the army in Kansas are narrated, and the various points we have touched, ably illustrated.

The authorized strength of the Army is 17,894; the actual strength on the 1st July, was 15,562. The number of enlistments during the twelve months ending September 30, was 4,440; the number of persons offering to enlist, but who were rejected for minority or unfitness, was 5,594. The number of casualties during the last fiscal year, by deaths, discharges and desertions, was 6,096, of which 3,223 were by desertion.

NAVY.

The Report of the Secretary of the Navy details the operations of squadrons during the last year, enters at length into the expedition of Lieutenants Berryman and Page,—the former engaged on the survey of the bottom of the sea between Newfoundland and Ireland, having in view the laying of a telegraph; and the latter occupied in exploring the river La Plata and its affluents, the Parana, Uruguay, &c.—reviews the general state of his department, and makes some reflections based on the facts stated.

Amongst the suggestions offered by Mr. Dobbin, are the necessity of two squadrons on the Pacific station, to keep pace with the growth of our commerce there; the importance of ordnance and practical gunnery to keep pace with the gunnery-practice of the British service, which has ships for the teaching of that especial art; further means to promote enlistment in the service, such as increased pay, honorable discharges, superior quality of clothing and provision, improvements in berthing the men, surgical care, and the shortening of cruising from three to two years; a fostering care and a gradual enlargement of the apprentice system; a recommendation that vacancies (by death and resignation) be filled by regular promotion, or by the restoration of dropped officers to the active list; the establishment of a small corps of assistant pursers for store-ships and vessels on special service, at present not so furnished; the establishment of a Judge Advocate, the lawful enforcement of the law authorizing courts-martial rendering it necessary; that the Nautical Almanac be placed under the charge of a naval professor of Mathematics. Such is an outline of the suggestions made by the head of the Naval Department, from whom we further learn that the Naval Academy continues to prosper, that E. K. Collins has been notified of the discontinuance of his extra appropriation, and that the Navy and Marine Corps estimates for the coming year amount to $3,913,979.

POST OFFICE.

The Report of Postmaster-General Campbell, gives us a bundle of carefully arranged statistics, which exhibit the following interesting facts:—

On the 13th June, 1856, there were 25,565 Post-Offices, being an increase of 4,664 in four years. On the same date, there were in operation nearly 8,000 mail routes, the total length of which was estimated at 235,642 miles, costing $6,035,474. These mail routes were divided as follows: 23,323 miles railroad, 14,951 steamboat, 50,453, coach, and nearly 154,000 inferior grades. The increase during the last fiscal year was nearly 20,000 miles railroad, 332 steamboat, 1,250 coach, and 82,000 inferior grades.

In the four years ending July 1st, 1856, the railroad service was increased 10,177 miles, showing that within the period noted this description of service was more than doubled. On the 1st of December, 1855, the length of railroad routes had increased to 21,310 miles; the total cost at the date amounting to $2,403,747. The entire cost of the inland service on the 1st July was $6,526,028.

The California expenditures for the year 1856 were $10,500,286, and the gross revenue, including annual appropriations for free matter, $7,620,821. The deficiency is $2,787,000.

10,238 miles were added to the total length of routes in Nebraska and Kansas.

The Postmaster-General recommends the abolition of the franking privilege; the pre-payment of all printed matter; the repeal of the act of 1845 which confers discretionary powers on the head of this department to make contracts for the ocean steam-ship service; regular contracts with the Panama Railroad Company not exceeding $50,000 per annum, via the Isthmus; and a contract not exceeding $200,000 per annum, via the Nicaragua or Tehuantepec route, so as to give a weekly mail. Negotiations are being made for the reduction of the transit charge on United States closed mails, and the rates of postage between the United States and Great Britain to twelve cents a single letter.

THE BLACK SQUALL COMING.

Imperial, Royal and Serene navigators in all European waters have good need to shorten sail and put their piratical crafts in proper trim to meet the approaching storm. The Black Squall is coming! There will soon be shattered wrecks upon the stormy beach, and blazing thrones. Europe is one mass of discontent. It is whispered in the streets, it escapes through the columns of the muzzled press of France, it occasionally rolls out like an alarm-drum in the leading pages or Special Correspondence of the London journals. The signs are ominous—the hand-writing requires no interpreter—the Dynasties that have emptied the public treasuries are going to be abated, and their assets will be appropriated by the People. The Sick Man is is getting sicker, and his physicians pronounce his malady incurable. The Turkish question is more complicated now than when the Imperial doctor of St. Petersburgh volunteered his prescriptions. The correspondent of the London Times, writing from Constantinople on the 7th of November, says:—"The Turkish empire is in a state of transition, and, as in every process of fermentation, the dregs come all to the surface and require skimming. The war has precipitated this crisis and brought it to its most critical state. This is the reason why, just at the moment when Europe flattered herself at having arrived at the solution of the complicated Eastern question, and when to those far off the danger seemed to be over, to those who have the whole system daily before their eyes things look blacker than before."

This admission from the correspondent of the organ of the British Government, dictating his letter under the eye of the British Ambassador, is sufficiently conclusive on the dangers which still menace the Turkish empire, and threaten to explode the hollow Treaty of Paris, and the still more hollow alliance of Queen Victoria and Louis Napoleon. The presence of a British fleet in the Black Sea, and an Austrian army on Turkish soil, proclaim to the world that, although the labors of the Paris conference, celebrated by balls, fetes, boar-hunts, and dynastic baptisms in France, by royal thanksgivings and dim-illuminations in London, by mediæval military displays and coronation rejoicings in Russia, a state of war still exists—a state of things by no means equable to the ruler of France, who will soon be compelled to make another raid upon the citizens of Paris, or a quick run once more for the white cliffs of Albion.

Should the dull perversity of England and the Punic faith of her Statesmen precipitate another war, Louis Napoleon cannot afford to draft his army a second time from France. He would be either an inglorious spectator of the struggle—which French chivalry could not tolerate—or be driven into a hostile attitude towards England. Any one of those contingencies are sufficiently dangerous to the rulers of either country. England feels that Russia has not been crippled nor even beaten in the late war. The fact of the most formidable armies in Europe being held at bay for twenty-four months before a single redoubt, and being unable even after it was captured by accident, to advance or retreat until the signing of the treaty of Peace allowed them to evacuate the Crimea, shows clearly enough that Russia has come out of the struggle more powerful than the Allies. England cannot afford to withdraw her fleet, and the Emperor of the French is not in a position to renew the war. "Things look blacker than before!"

France is upon the eve of another revolution, and France is the Standard Bearer of insurrection in Europe. Under the influence of sudden panic, created by military terrorism, she accepted the dictatorship of Louis Napoleon.

But a brave nation will not long submit to the irresponsible will of any man. The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that "the symptoms of public discontent to which I have more than once directed attention, appear to have at last opened the eyes of the authorities, and those whom the question touches more nearly." The person whom the question touches more nearly is the Emperor himself; but he will require to have more heads than eyes if he ever wears a crown. Again, the same writer says: "In France the administrative authority leaves nothing untouched; it can do no act without affecting the honor and property of its citizens. Since the 2d Dec., 1851, the sphere of its action has been considerably extended, but it is known that many of the persons engaged have not proved equal to that enlarged authority. The result is, as might have been expected, faults have been multiplied, and discontent among the people has proportionately increased. All this may pass in silence until such time as the measure of suffering is full, and the patience of the people exhausted. If it should be necessary some day to make an appeal to the country, the government would find that hardly one friendly voice would respond to it, but that it would hear one general cry of complaint, reproach and indignation. It may be asked if the Minister of the Interior is aware of this perilous state of things. Contrary to the general belief, I take it for granted that he is; and if so, he must, without loss of time, apply the necessary remedy. Will a second coup d'etat be attempted. I doubt it. The situation of affairs is not the same as that which, according to many people, excused or palliated the first; and no one knows better than the man who has most profited by it, that the same thing cannot be done twice within so short a period. It is fair to admit that the mind of the Emperor, all powerful as it may be, has been so much occupied with great questions of foreign policy for the last three years as to leave him very little time for the internal administration of his country. Yet he had better look to it. His authority is undermined by his own delegates, and his name is brought into disrepute by unworthy acts of which he is ignorant, but for which an entire people consider him responsible. He had better look to it before the moment comes when to him may be applied those terrible words which other rulers have heard before him, 'C'est trop tard!'"

It is clear that France is on the eve of a revolution more terrible than any which she has yet passed through. The oppressed nations of Europe will actively sympathise with the French people. They will not await the result of the struggle which the erection of the first barricade shall have inaugurated. Promptly and boldly, the charging cry of the Revolution will be re-echoed from Palermo to Vienna. It will console the captive in his dungeon, and rouse to victory and vengeance the oppressed millions who have languished in bondage throughout the fairest portions of the old world. Verily, the long-postponed day of reckoning is at hand. The Black Squall is coming!

LETTER TO THE BOSTON DEMOCRATS.

Tremont House, Boston, Tuesday, Dec. 2, 1856.

My Dear Sir:—To the last moment I deferred a reply to the invitation which, as Chairman of the Committee of Invitations, you did me the honor to communicate. Up to the last moment I had indulged in the hope that circumstances would permit me to be present at the banquet which, to-morrow evening, in Faneuil Hall, is to commemorate the victory of the American Democracy in sustainment of the American Union.

But circumstances which I find it impossible to obviate compel me to be absent, and I am forced, in a few hurried words, to assure you that, in your just and glorious exultation, I heartily participate, and that, as one of the foreign population, I am, heart and soul, with the strict interpreters of the Constitution—with them in conflict, adversity, and triumph.

A Revolutionist under a Monarchy, I am a Conservative under a Republic. This sentiment I boldly utter on behalf of thousands of Irish immigrants, invested with or aspiring to the sovereignty of American citizenship. Such a sentiment, I well know, will wake the ancient memories and echoes of the Hall where the most memorable words of the foremost man of Massachusetts interpret, in letters of gold, the noblest scene of his majestic public life. I am,

Your obedient servant,

And faithful friend,

Thomas Francis Meagher

To the Chairman of the Committee of Invitations, Faneuil Hall.

POSTSCRIPT.

John Mitchel arrived in this city on Sunday night. Early on Monday morning we had the delight of meeting him. He is in admirable health and spirits, and comes to us crowned with golden opinions and the proudest intellectual successes. Nashville, St. Louis, Chicago, Detroit and Buffalo have been within a few days, one after the other, the crowded theatres wherein his merit as a public lecturer, and his patriotism, genius, and high spirit as a man, have been triumphantly recognized. We write on the eve of his address in the Tabernacle. His subject—Foreign Influence—will be nobly treated, and thousands will rapturously greet him in that hall, where the echoes of his brave heart and bright solid intellect still vibrate through the memory of the people. From New-York he proceeds to Boston, Philadelphia, and other neighboring cities. The heartiest welcome awaits him in each and all.

Richard O'Gorman's lecture before the Catholic Library Association has deservedly won the enthusiastic applause of all who heard it. In another column a synopsis of it will be found. Excellent as it is, it conveys a very imperfect impression of the vast field of historical matter over which the speaker passed, and the pleasant light and flowers he flung upon it. The honor, piety and chivalry of the grandest epochs of the European Past have, with an eloquent sympathy, a genial philosophy, and a gallant manliness, been vindicated by him.

The Very Rev. Dr. Cummings follows our friend, O'Gorman, before the same Association. His subject—Catholicity and America—is one of especial interest at this moment, and will be sure to attract an eager and overflowing audience. The lecture is announced for the 16th inst. The personal popularity of Dr. Cummings, must render the occasion a complete and cordial success.

From an extended tour through Europe, our distinguished scientific friend, Oliver Byrne, returned by the Arago to this city on last Friday. He has been a keen and studious observer of the political symptoms and tendencies of the Old World for the last few months, and communicates to us many important facts which lie deeper in the social life of France and England than Emperor or Queen suspect. The Black Squall is coming. America alone—The Great Republic—will ride it out.

Just as we were closing up, Lieut. Green, of the City Horse Guard, handed us a statement of the receipts and disbursements on account of the lecture recently delivered by Mr. Meagher, for the benefit of the widow and child of Capt. Kerrigan. The nett proceeds are over Nine hundred dollars. The statement will appear in full next week.

ROYALTY AND REPUBLICANISM.

Outline of an Address delivered in the Academy of Music, before the "Young Men's Democratic Union Club," by Thomas Francis Meagher.

In minute matters the New-York Herald was microscopically correct. Having set out for Washington, a few days previous to his Inauguration, and having arrived in New-York, the Herald informed them, that General Pierce proceeded on foot from the cars to the carriage in attendance, carpet-bag in hand. The picture was a pleasant one, though somewhat different from that which recently represented Alexander, the son of Nicholas, proceeding to Moscow to be crowned. It forcibly suggested the subject of the evening—the Contrasts between Royalty and Republicanism—Europe and America.

The day the Crystal Palace was opened in New-York, these contrasts vividly impressed themselves on the speaker's mind. An attentive witness of the ceremony with which that noble palace, sacred to Industrial Art, was opened, he was a spectator of a similar scene elsewhere. The Atlantic had been dispossessed of half its terrors and domain. The Adriatic—with its fiery steeds rushing through the storm—would follow up the conquest. They should rear no dull obelisk to the brave ship-wright, fashioned by whose unerring hand, that giant of the waters leaped to life from the forests and the mines. His monument was built. Trampling on the billows, it would sweep the lightnings from its path. Mozart dies, when his eternal Requiem is complete. George Steers breathes his last, when his master-work is finished. But swift as steam might bear them to the shores of Europe, the mind outstripped it. From the Hudson to the Thames, was with it the achievement of a second. Thus, whilst seated under that Olympian dome, in presence of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, he was at the same time looking down from the gallery which overhung the great transept of the Crystal Palace, Hyde Park, London, and beheld the solemnities with which, under the auspices of Queen Victoria, that edifice was thrown open to the public. He was in two places at once. More than this. He was a spectator of two events, two years apart, at the one and the same time. In this instance, neither time nor space interposed the slightest difficulty.

There was President Pierce—having ridden up all the way from the Battery, at the head of the First Division, side by side with Major-General Sandford, the old Butcher Troop acting as escort—and his Excellency having been drenched to the skin, and having taken a glass of water in a Restaurant opposite the Palace—a glass of water with just enough brandy in it, as the reporter of the Herald delicately observed, to kill the animalculæ—there was President Pierce, in the midst of the People, talking and laughing to every one about him—as the tallest Republican finds it no difficulty or disparagement to do—and having neither a Mistress of the Robes, nor a Groom of the Bed-chamber, nor a Gold Stick-in-Waiting, to hand him his hat. Across the water, there was her Majesty seated on a chair covered with gold and crimson cloth, under an octagon canopy trimmed with blue satin, with the ancient body of Beef-Eaters, paralyzed with loyalty on either side of her, and a dense wall of dead-heads—such as Masters of the Buck-Hounds, Stewards of the Green-Cloth, Keepers of the Privy Purse and Conscience—keeping the ignoble crowd aloof, lest the breath of honest labor should come betwixt the wind and her nobility. Late in the evening of the day on which the Crystal Palace was opened in New-York, the speaker called at the Astor House to pay his respects to the President. On the steps he met the Chief of Police. The worthy Chief looked well there. He coincided with the massive masonry in the shadow of which he stood. His architecture assimilates with the Doric solidity of the pillars which sustain the vestibule of that hospitable house. Glaring benevolently at him through his spectacles, he observed there wasn't much fear, he thought, of the President being assassinated there that night. Whether Mr. Branch's suspicions concerning the birth-place and baptism of Mr. Matsell were correct or otherwise, that observation of the worthy Chief was conclusive, the speaker thought, of his knowledge and appreciation of the democratic institutions of America, and the spirit which animates her masses. Without sentinels, retinue, or spies—the welcome guest of a house to which the whole city have access—hundreds swarming up the stair-case to shake him by the hand—there stood President Pierce, the head of a nation whose commercial greatness overtops the world, as its Constitution instructs, and its liberty illuminates it—there he stood, without any of the expensive frippery of foreign Courts to detract from the simple grandeur of the magistracy with which he was invested—there he stood, receiving not the simpering sycophancy nor the starched courtesies of subjects, but the frank, utterly unaffected, promptly uttered greetings of men equal to him in freedom, religion, citizenship—equal to him, before the law and the public suffrage, in all the blessings which their Republican system of society conferred, and which the charter of its incorporation imperishably secured.

The incidents of the day to which he referred suggested other contrasts. The days of Louis the Fourteenth recurred to him. Dramatic days! Days when chevaliers and dames burlesqued Arcadian innocence in brocades and hoops, high-heeled shoes and powdered top-knots, or with less violence to nature, revived the loves, the wrangles, and symposiacs of the Gods. Corinthian days! Days of sumptuous sensuality, when one ripe favorite succeeds another in volatile succession, and a cast-off mistress consoles herself on six hundred thousand dollars a year. Asiatic days! Days of prodigality, material magnificence, and despotism—days when France, with all her poets, statesmen, soldiers, and philosophers, was but the cushioned foot-stool of a relentless egotist and incomparable spendthrift. In severe contrast to them appeared the days when Andrew Jackson discharged the duties of the Presidency. But the severity of the contrast was full of hope, consolation, goodness. The memory of the Grand Monarque was like unto the picture of Belshazzar's feast—gorgeous, sensual, gloomy—piles of golden wine-cups glistening through the shadows of an Assyrian architecture—but high above, the Hand-writing on the wall—the spectral warning of a retribution more terrible than that which deluged the city of the Chaldeans. The memory of the great citizen of Tennessee was like unto a strong oak in a fruitful plain—stretching its arms to the North and to the South, to the East and to the West—still and for ever growing—still and for ever drinking freshness from the soil in which its roots lie buried—still and for ever lifting its mighty head in majesty to Heaven, crowned with green leaves no storm shall disperse. From these celebrities of history—from the voluptuous architect of Versailles, as he said, and the honest master of the Hermitage—the speaker passed on to Washington and Bonaparte. He quoted Chateaubriand. Of these towering men, the author of the Genius of Christianity had with his superb pencil thrown off pictures—consummate master-pieces—the exquisite truthfulness of which in the one instance, the terrible truthfulness of which in the other, no rival artist in analysis of character had excelled. With a handful of citizens, Washington defends himself within the narrow but sacred circle of domestic firesides. He does not cross seas. He does not march from Memphis to Vienna. His battles are not those of Arbella and Pharsalia. He upsets no thrones to build others from their ruins. He acts as if he held the liberties of the future in trust. It is not his own destiny alone which controls him. It is the destiny of a new world. Washington leaves the United States as a trophy on his battle-fields.

Bonaparte has none of the features of this sedate American. In the tumult of notorious events, he desires only to create his own renown. Emulative of the Gods of Homer, he must compass the world in four strides. Appearing on the banks of every river, he inscribes his name suddenly in the archives of every people, and disbursing crowns to his family and soldiers, extemporizes his laws, victories and monuments. Each is rewarded according to his deeds. The fame of Washington expands with liberty from age to age. The fame of Bonaparte will remain to future generations, isolated from any benediction, an authority for tyrants, great and small.

Coming down to our own time, the speaker, in illustration of the two political systems which divide the world, introduced Louis Napoleon and James Buchanan—the one illustrating, as he said, the vices of Royalty—the other, the virtues of Republicanism. The Coup d' etât was described. Of that tragedy, Louis Napoleon was the Iago. The speaker had no apology to make for speaking thus of the most flagitious criminal of France. What though he was now at large; what though he sleeps in the bed of the Bourbon, and feasts sumptuously every day off his stolen plate; what though he dictates a message to his Baltic fleet from Windsor Castle, and dines in Guildhall, the guest of the Lord Mayor, old Turtle Chops, of London; what though his legions, returning from their feast of carrion in the Crimea, defile before him with cries of Vive l'Empereur; what though, as recent mails from Havre tell us, the imperial festivities continue at Compeigne, and Louis Napoleon enjoys hunting by day, and fancy-balls by night, in the style of Louis the Fourteenth; what of it—what recks it—what availeth it that a man gain the whole world and lose his own soul—there is a scar upon his forehead no crown can hide, though Cardinal or Pontiff should place it there—it is the blood of the people—the blood of the Second of December.

He, the speaker, was no worshipper of success. No worshipper of the Golden Calf. The swindler was still to him a swindler though he flaunt his spurious liveries through the streets, and forges a crest with which to legitimize the plate he has purloined. The fratricide was still to him a fratricide, though he wash his crimson hand in waters sweeter than those of Siloam, and drains the public treasury with the excesses of his charity. The tyrant was still to him a tyrant, though he amused the public with fire-works and cattle-shows, and, to popularize the baptism of his presumptive heir, proclaimed an amnesty to those whom his insatiate avidity for power consigned to chains, but to whom no amnesty could bring relief—for royal sunshine, special as it is, does not restore the shattered frame, the broken heart, the blasted hope, nor does the grave give up its dead. By the violation of his oath to the Republic, which, with a magnanimity to be found only in a Republic, cancelled the decree which shut him out from France, whose peace he had twice from no public necessity disturbed; by the corruption of the Army; by the intimidation of the Judiciary; by the peremptory suppression of the High Court of Sessions; by the disorganization of society, effected through the agency of spies, false alarms, and slanders against the Republic; by every crime a man, a citizen, or a prince can perpetrate, Louis Napoleon had set his foot upon that bad eminence, the conquest, the splendor, and the guilt of which Milton in his sublime epic two hundred years ago described—

> High on a throne of royal state, which far
> Outshone the wealth of Ormus or of Ind,
> Satan exalted sat!

From this picture—the portentous consummation of royalty—it was time for them to avert their gaze, and in the sobriety, the justice, the equanimity and truthfulness of Republicanism, as exemplified in America, renew their hopes for the future of humanity. It was time for them—full time for them—to contemplate an example of good citizenship—citizenship rewarded with the civic crown, and in the enjoyment of the highest honor the Republic could confer, contradicting the aspersion that Republics always are ungrateful.

The speaker next enumerated the public services of James Buchanan, from the time of his taking his seat in the legislature of Pennsylvania to the close of his mission to England. His negotiation of the commercial treaty which, under the Presidency of Jackson, threw open the Black and Baltic seas to the merchants of America; his conduct on the question of the admission of Texas into the Union; his conduct on other questions of national consequence; his whole career, from first to last, was rapidly sketched. The narrative was unnecessary, the speaker felt. A cataract of speeches, pamphlets, letters, and editorials, rushing uproariously all through the contest just closed, had informed the world of all these dates and incidents long since. Enough to say, that having from his earliest manhood served his country faithfully—having honestly worked out his apprenticeship to her—now in the solid maturity of his years she rewards him with the largest share in the concern. Enough to say, that having with diligence, spotless rectitude, and the steadiest ability labored for years to consolidate her interests, augment her fortune and domain, extend her salutary influence, and establish her good name; never having, as that Prince of Darkness ruling France had done, disturbed the public peace to aggrandize himself; never having steamed up the Potomac, with a starved eagle under his arm, to pounce upon the Treasury; never having sought to corrupt the army, the clergy, or the magistracy; breaking no law, oath, or covenant; sturdily devoted to republicanism here, elsewhere, and everywhere, in London as well as Lancaster; without resorting to the least intrigue, treachery, or violence; without a speck of blood upon his hand or the shadow of a falsehood on his soul;—he is declared the First Citizen of America. On the Fourth day of March he will proceed to the Capitol, and there in presence of the Senate, the Messengers of the Electoral College, the House of Representatives, Ambassadors of Foreign Courts, Delegations from every State, officers of the brave and enlightened Army to whose custody is committed the Ensigns of the Republic, officers of the Navy whose wooden walls bear through the storm the thunderbolts of freedom—standing on the steps of the Capitol, in presence of this great audience, with head uncovered, he will call upon God—as God will be his Judge—to be the witness of the truth with which he consecrates himself to the high Ministry of the Commonwealth. In its modesty, pure decorum, sublime significance—with liberty to illuminate, the spirits of the Revolutionary Fathers to sanctify, and Providence to bless it—it was a scene which would infinitely transcend the Baptism of the Child of France, the Obsequies of Wellington, the Installation of the Eagles in the Champs de Mars, the Masquerades of Windsor, where a Duchess studs herself with a million worth of diamonds, or the Coronation of the Muscovite.

AWAY TO THE WEST!

Away to the West—the far-spreading West!
With its forests and prairies wide,
Where the Father of Floods, with unceasing flow,
Rolls onward an endless tide!

Away to the West, the God-given West,
And make thee a home on its soil,
Where Nature bland, with a generous hand,
With plenty will crown thy toil!

O quick depart, from the crowded mart,
Where e'en hearts are trafficked and sold—
Where Avarice lean, with merciless mien,
Turns life-blood into gold!

O why remain, in the servile train,
At the feet of Wealth to bow,
Where pamper'd drones rear palace-homes
By the sweat of the toiler's brow?

Away to the West, the free wide West,
Where no thrall the poor man chains,
Where all may be, as the wild winds free,
That sweep o'er the boundless plains!

'Tis there thou'lt feel, as never before,
That God is upon thy brow,
And that all who rest, on Nature's breast,
To Him alone need bow.

O who would be scorned, and humbly beg
From the rich man Labor and Bread,
When by honest toil, on God's free soil,
The Father himself, will feed?

Then hie thee hence to the Sunset-Land,
While yet in thy vigor and prime,
Where Nature awaits, with a "Welcome home,"
The wand'rer from every clime!

THE MUSES—POLYMNIA.*

Each mood of the soul and each mode of the lyre
I alone, on Cytheron, control or inspire.
Each true lyric song-bird to me spreads his wings,
And aloft thro' Jove's ether soars, revels and sings!
The thunders of Pindar were caught at my shrine;
And Tyrtæus, in dreams, heard my whispers divine,
The lyre and the trumpet, the harp and the lute,
Soft measures Ionian, the rich Doric flute,
All thrill to my fingers and tremblingly tell
Inspiration's wild blasts from my altars that swell!
Combining alone, action, music and song,
With the strong rush of Passion I thunder along,
The celestial afflatus careering before,
While all hearts, hushed or glowing, bow down and adore!
I grasp the War-trumpet, and hark! at the blast
The trampling of cavalry, marshaling fast,
To the boom of the cannon and roll of the drums!
The continents ring and the islands afar,
When I summon Kings, armies and vultures to war.

* Personated by Miss Sarah Morgan.

The songs of Tyrtæus were sharper than swords,
And like sparks from steel clashing, the Marseillaise words.
Hear Dibden the Navy of Albion inspire,
See the young Teuton bard of the "sword and the lyre,"
Gallant Kœrner, the clarion of Germany's soul
When she rises in wrath against tyrant control!
The swift dithyrambic is mine as of old,
When Horace beheld the young God in the world,
And his tongue by the full view of Deity fir'd,
Uttered raptures unknown save to Vates inspir'd.
The harp at the feast and the song in the hall,
And the hymn at the Altar to me are due—all.
The solemn-ton'd organ's magnificent flow
Of triumph celestial, or heavenlier woe—
Whose full-swelling harmonies, countless combined,
Now roll like the ocean, now sigh like the wind—
Now seem spirit-voices from regions above
Replete with divine adoration and love—
Now mock the loud tempest, the chariot, the wings
Of the last avatar of the great King of Kings—
The organ I fashioned. Therein I infuse
The purest and best that belongs to each Muse.
It rose on my visions, resplendently bright,
As I dreamed on Parnassus, one star-spangled night!
I claim, for this matchless achievement alone,
To be Queen of the Muses on Helicon's throne.

MR. SAVAGES '98 AND '48—THIRD EDITION.

In the space of six months Mr. Savage's work has attained a third edition, which, considering the almost total paralysis of the book-trade during the months occupied by the Presidential campaign, may be taken as a very decided success. There continues to be a steady demand for the volume—a large portion of the last edition having been ordered before it had gone to press.

The third edition has been very usefully improved. Forty pages have been added, embracing an Appendix and a copious Index, containing nearly twelve hundred references to political facts, military movements, and personal allusions in the text. The Appendix is peculiarly valuable to the historical student in giving the original addresses issued by the national bodies in Ireland during the revolutionary months of '48. Public documents are the bases of history, and in the various proclamations and addresses issued by the Irish Confederation, the Protestant Repeal Association, the Trades and Citizens of Dublin, the Students, etc., to the French Republic, to the people of Ireland, to the Protestants of Ulster, to the Political Clubs on Trial by Jury, and against Lord Clarendon, the reader may find a thorough daguerreotype of the public spirit of the day. These documents completely indicate the national mind of the hour. They at once illustrate the national hopes and the oppression which inspired them. They form a chapter of the European History of that eventful year to which every future writer on the subject must refer; and as they can be found in no other publication, their presence here must greatly enhance the historical value of this work. The price continues as before.

LAKE NGAMI; or, Explorations and Discoveries during four years wanderings in the wilds of South-western Africa. By CHARLES JOHN ANDERSON. (Numerous illustrations.) Harper & Brothers

From earliest youth, the author of this exceedingly interesting and clever volume, has been haunted by visions of African travel. The misty obscurity of the region to which his brain, as it were, became thus early affianced, but added force to his imagination. He beheld in its untravelled recesses, a star that led him on, and after encountering many obstacles, he at last in London was introduced to Mr. Francis Galton, author of "Tropical South Africa," who was about undertaking an expedition to explore the unknown regions beyond the boundary of the Cape of Good Hope Colony, and to penetrate, if possible, to the recently discovered Lake which gives the title to the present work. Discovering Mr. Anderson to be a congenial spirit, Galton made a proposal which was accepted, and the pair of travellers set out with an immense quantity of goods to traffic with the dusky barbarians on the one hand; and all sorts of scientific and artistic apparatus to take observations, and preserve objects of natural history and scenery on the other.

Mr. Anderson's book gives the experiences of two expeditions: one undertaken in 1850, and the other in 1854. In the first of these journeys the localities of the Damaras (scarcely until then known in Europe,) and of Ovambo, were explored. In the second, undertaken solely by Mr. Anderson, the newly discovered Lake was reached by a route heretofore deemed impracticable. The author not only describes the general appearance of the regions he visited, but he gives the most precise information he was able to collect in illustration of the geological, ornithological and general history of the country. He also, at considerable length, details the varieties of religion, the manners and customs of the native tribes visited by him in his journey. The illustrations, by Mr. Woolf, are very good.

THE DIAMOND ATLAS. With Descriptions of all Countries, exhibiting their actual and comparative extent, and their present Political Divisions, founded on the most recent discoveries and Rectifications. By CHAS. COLBY, A. M., editor of "Morse's General Atlas of the World. Morse & Gaston.

This elegantly printed volume contains geographical details of the western hemisphere. It is designed to be a valuable book, full and accurate in its information, and thoroughly achieves what it sets out to perform. The maps, though small in size, present a correct delineation of the natural features of the countries, with accurate outlines of their present political divisions. In the States in which the counties are subdivided into townships, the names of the latter are given on the maps by means of their initial and final letters. In the western states, which—says the editor—were surveyed under direction of the General Government, all the "base lines" and the "principal meridians" are correctly stated, so that the minutest locality can be ascertained in a moment. The maps of other countries are prepared with equal accuracy. The work is a small quarto, double columned, and must prove a most useful companion to the desk of the student, merchant, editor, lawyer, or citizen general interested in business. The descriptions are written with clearness, and the maps are engraved by the cerographic process discovered by Mr. Morse.

A NEW SYSTEM OF WRITING.

Mr. William S. Mac Laurin, a noted teacher of Penmanship for thirty years in this city, has received a Patent for a new system of instruction in his art. Mr. Mac L. remarks, that it has never been clearly seen that there is an essential difference between the ability to transfer to paper any form existing in the mind, and the habit of producing upon paper such form without any conscious effort of the mind. That such a difference does exist is clear enough. The mind of the business man—be he merchant, lawyer or editor—is generally so occupied with the matter of his writing that no thought can be spared for the forms of the letters. Any one who—like ourselves—is liable to receive from fifty to one hundred letters daily on all sorts of topics and from all sorts of people must be disagreeably impressed with this fact. Mr. Mac Laurin proposes to teach a good habit of writing, so that a pupil's hand, once formed on his system, will write gracefully, clearly and equally, as it were by second nature, irrespective of the influence, which the thinking properties of the brain works on the characters to be written. His system is exceedingly novel and interesting; and we doubt not, but that, after carefully going through the exercises laid down in Mac Laurin's complete course, which can be had of the author at 345 Broadway, the benefit derived will be very apparent.

PROSPECTS OF THE MAGAZINES.

Putnam for December brings the eighth volume of that brilliant periodical to a close. The last volume contains several exceedingly able articles—such as were worthy of the best days of Blackwood and Fraser. We make especial reference to such papers as the Poetry of War, and others of the like stamp, to which we have before alluded. Although we may differ with the Magazine in some respects, it must be admitted as a credit to American literature. In opening their ninth volume, the publishers have only to say that they mean to relax no exertions to render it thoroughly worthy of the favor it has already received from the public. They announce that due regard will be had to variety and popular entertainment, and while the Monthly will continue its survey of great public questions, it will not forget that its readers expect amusement as well as instruction. With this view, a new novel entitled "Witching Times," is commenced the present month. It is to be concluded in thirty chapters.

Harpers' December issue opens the fourteenth volume of one of the most entertaining and useful miscellanies ever published. In whatever point of view we take it, the work does credit to American enterprise, skill, tact, taste and talent. A great proportion of the earlier volumes was re-printed matter; but as the Magazine became a "household word," the proprietors gradually repaid popular support by supplying able, original, biographical and descriptive essays, notes of travel, and tales, with a monthly history of home and foreign events, until it has arrived at what it is at present, a most readable and instructive miscellany. Add to this the profusion of illustrations, admirable as they are, which crowd its pages, and the price demanded; and one cannot wonder that English people who are in the habit of giving half a crown (62 1-2 cents) for the British monthlies, look upon Harpers' as a miracle in the publishing way, to be only understood by a visit to America. The present issue opens with a delightful paper, exuberantly illustrated, on Washington Irving and his dear old house at Sunny-side. Are we wrong in thinking we recognise both the pen and pencil of Addison Richards thus happily illustrating the honored home of the "Literary father of his country?"

The Knickerbocker closes its forty-eighth volume this month. The number is a bright one, and gives evidence of the spirit in which the new volume will be conducted. The publisher's announcement informs us that "Mr. Cozzens will contribute a new and really original story, which will appear in every number; and Mr. Kimball will furnish a sketch or a story as often as his other duties will permit." The Up-River Correspondent will continue his letters, and Charles G. Leland ("Mace Sloper") shall still interest us with his "Observations." The writings of several highly accomplished lady contributors will grace the pages regularly. With these and other regular contributors, and the "Table" of Mr. Clark, whose long experience has made him au fait in his department, "Old Knick" will be able to present a monthly literary treat so varied that no refined taste can fail to be gratified.

Mrs. Stephens closes the first volume of her Magazine. Her success has been eminent and well-deserved. It is, without compeer, the most elegant lady's companion in the country. We take pleasure in recording that it is firmly established, and its circulation already more than a paying one. It met with more than the usual favor on its first appearance, and each month has but added to its stability. The publisher announces that in January a new novel will be commenced, entitled "West Point," by an officer of the United States Army, with graphical and characteristic illustrations by Dallas. This work is in a field hitherto untouched by the novelist, which is eminently an American one. We learn that it is a remarkable work, graphic, dramatic, full of character, and likely to make a sensation. The hero is taken through West Point, graduates at that institution, and undergoes a series of adventures, in an upward struggle from poverty to eminence. Mrs. E. F. Ellet's "Firesides of the Revolution," will be continued. The matter contained in this series, is all new, never having been published before, and was collected by Mrs. Ellet from private sources. A new feature is to be added to the monthly in the shape of illustrated fashions. This is undertaken in response to numerous requests from subscribers. The exquisite pencil of J. A. Dallas, who has given us already so many beautiful conceptions, and whose poetry of the pencil has been justly admired, and received the most flattering encomiums, will contribute largely. Lost Jewels, by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, will still continue, illustrated as heretofore—while to the various literary branches, romance, criticism, papers on art, editorial gossip, tales, sketches, humorous papers, &c., well known authors will contribute, and render this Magazine, in its general literature, unexcelled by any other in the country.

Literary and Artistic News.

Mr. J. Wallace, Dentist, lately submitted to the Clonmel Mechanics' Institute some rare scientific specimens of concentric turnings, consisting of balls, cubes, cones, and a marked dice, within a sphere. These balls, he said, had been the pride of China, and the ingenuity with which they had been constructed had long excited admiration and surprise; public opinion, as a writer in the Dublin University Magazine not long ago observed, assigning to the Chinese alone the palm for the wonderful design. But he (Mr. Wallace) anxious to spend a leisure hour, and to show that Irishmen in the path of discovery and science did not fear any discovery of skill—ventures himself to produce these same balls, cones, cubes, and a dice in a spherical form never seen or heard of before. The specimens were critically inspected, and found to be unique in every respect.

Somebody has given this miniature of a noted writer:—"Douglas Jerrold, a well-known contributor to Punch, and editor of various publications, is a man about fifty years of age, and in person is remarkably spare and diminutive. His face is sharp, angular, and his eye of a greyish hue. He is probably one of the most caustic writers of the age, and, with keen sensibility, he often writes under the impulse of the moment articles which his cooler judgment often condemns. Although a believer in hydropathy, his habits do not conform to the internal application of Adam's ale. His Caudle Lectures have been read by every one. In conversation he is quick at retort—not always refined. He is a husband and grandfather."

The Mormons in Copenhagen have a newspaper, called the Skandinaviens Etjerne, or Star of Scandinavia. In a late number of this paper, it is stated that the number of the "Latter Day Saints" in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, amounts to 2692 persons, among whom are 21 elders, 19 priests, 15 teachers, and 11 deacons. In Sweden, there are 340 Mormons; in Denmark, 2247, of whom 1208 are in Copenhagen. There are but 7 Mormons in Iceland.

It is said of Daniel Webster that when he once arrived at the Girard House from a hot, dusty, exhausting ride from Washington, the servant pouring more water into the glass than proportion admitted, he exclaimed, with a voice and look with which John Philip Kemble, as Coriolanus, might have rebuked the Volscian—"Boy, don't INUNDATE the brandy."

M. Cabet, founder of the Icarian community at Nauvoo, died at St. Louis, on the 9th ult., of an attack of apoplexy. The community at Nauvoo was founded upon the ruins of the Mormon company of Joe Smith, and the buildings occupied by the latter were devoted to the use of the Icarians. The age of M. Cabet was about 69 years.

A gentleman in Detroit proposes to endow the Fine Arts Department of the University of Michigan with a series of casts from the most celebrated antiques. This will be done on a liberal scale. They will include copies from the best Greek sculptures—many of the Roman, the Assyrian and Egyptian. Professor Bradish will visit Europe in the spring to fulfil the purpose.

The statue of the Duke Charles de Mecklenburg was lately stolen from the garden at Potsdam. The metal was stolen from the original thief, and both the fellows were discovered through the sale of it at a very low price.

LOCAL CHANGES AND LOCAL FACTS

OF OLD NEW-YORK.

BY JOHN F. WATSON,
Author of the Annals of Philadelphia.

A gentleman eighty years of age, told me of his digging out the trunk of a walnut tree, at nine feet depth, at his house at the Coenties slip, near Pearl street.

He well remembered, in early life, to have seen a natural spring of fine fresh water at the fort, at a position a little north-west of Hone's house. There was also a fresh water well once at N. Prime's house near the Battery.

He saw the old fort cut down about the year 1788–9, when they found beneath the vault of the ancient Dutch church, once there, the leaden coffins of Lord Bellermont and lady. Vansant and Janeway were charged to remove them to St. Paul's Church.

He saw a linseed oil factory worked with wind sails, on a high hill of woods, about a quarter of a mile north-east of the Kolch. This was about the year 1790.

About the same time he saw a beautiful meadow, and flourishing grass cut on the declining hill back of the City Hall towards the Kolch.

The "tea water fountain," out by Stuyvesant's field, is now very good, and was in great repute formerly. The region of country near the prison, on the East river, has now excellent water. There "Knapp" gets his "spring water" for the city supply.

A lady of about eighty-six years of age said she well remembered when the locality of the present St. Paul's Church was a wheat field.

She also spoke of her remembrance of a "ferry house" in Broad street, up above "Exchange place," (then garden alley) to which place the Indians used to come and sit down in the street near there, and make and sell baskets.

The place called "Canvas Town," was made after the great fire in 1776. It lay towards the East River, and from Broad street to Whitehall street. It was so called from the temporary construction of the houses, and their being generally covered with canvas instead of roofs. Very lewd and dissolute persons generally were their tenants, and gave them their notoriety and fame.

While the old fort existed, before the revolution, it contained within its bounds the mansion of the governors (military chieftains) and their gardens. There governors Dunmore, Tryon, &c., dwelt. New-York was a military station, and as such it had always a regiment of foot and a company of artillery; also a guard ship in the bay.

Mr. Abram Brower, aged seventy-five, informed me that the lots fronting the Vly market were originally sold out by the city corporation, at only one dollar the foot.

He said the market in Broadway (the Oswego I presume) was once leased to a Mr. Crosby for only 20*s.* for seven years.

He remembered when only horse-boats ferried from Brooklyn, with only two men to row it, in which service they sometimes drove towards Governor's Island, and employed a whole hour. Only one ferry was used on the North River side, and then not to go across to Jersey city as now, but down to Blazing Star. Those who then came from Bergen, &c., used the country boats.

He said the Dutch yachts (then so called) were from one to two weeks in a voyage to Hudson and Albany. They came to, usually every night, "slow and sure." Then all on board spoke the Dutch language. [The mayor, Thomas Willet, in 1665, informs the corporation "he intends for Albania with the first opportunity, and prays its leave of absence."]

The last Dutch schoolmaster was Vanbombeler; he kept his school till after the revolution. Mr. Brower, himself, went to a Dutch school, to his grand-father's, Abram Delanoye, (a French Hugenot, via Holland,) who kept his school in Courtland street.

The first Methodist preaching in New-York was at a house in William street, then a rigging loft. There Embury first preached; and being a carpenter, he made his own pulpit—a true Puritan characteristic.

Mr. Brower, when a boy, never heard of "Greenwhich," the name was not even known; but the Dutch, when they spoke of the place, called it Shawbackanicka, an Indian name as he supposed. "Greenwich street" was of course unknown.

He knew of no daily papers until after the revolution. Weyman and Gaine had each a weekly one, corresponding to their limited wants and knowledge. The first daily paper was by F. Child & Co., called the New-York Daily Advertiser, began in 1785.

He saw Andrews hanging in gibbets for piracy; he was hung long in irons, just above the Washington market, and was then taken to Gibbet Island and suspended there; year 1769.

I notice such changes as the following:—

Maiden lane is greatly altered for the better; formerly that street was much lower near its junction with Pearl street; it was much narrower, and had no separate foot pavement; its gutter ran down the middle of the street. Where the lofty triangular store of Watson is seen up said street, was once a low sooty blacksmith shop, Olstein's, (a rarity now in the sight of passing citizens,) and near it a cluster of low wooden buildings.

In Pearl street, below Maiden lane, I have seen proof positive of the primitive river margin there; several of the cellars, and shallow ones too, had water in them from that original cause.

I perceive that Duane-street from Broadway, is greatly filled up; from one and a half to two stories there is made ground. The south corner of Duane-street, at Broadway, is sixteen feet filled up, and the same I am told in Broadway. South of this was originally a hill descending northward.

Where Leonard-street traverses Broadway and descends a hill to the Collect, was well remembered an orchard but a few years ago. Some of the Collect was still open fourteen or fifteen years ago (it is said), and was skated upon.

The original Collect main spring still exists on Leonard-street, having a house now over it, lettered "supply engine."

The Kolch waters still ooze through the new made filled in ground, into the cellars, especially in wet seasons.

When they dug out some of the Kolch ground, some used the earth as turf, thinking it had that quality.

The Collect street runs through the leading line or centre of the old Kolch channel, and has under its pavement a sewer to lead off the water. This street is the thoroughfare of so much water, as to make it necessary to incline the street deeply to the middle as a deep gutter-way. Indeed, so much water, "deep and broad," flows along it like a sullied brook, that it might be well called Brook-street; helped, as the idea is, by the numerous foot planks, as miniature bridges, laid across it at intervals for the convenience of foot passengers.

About the year 1784–5, property near New-York went down greatly; few or none had money to buy with. About the year 1785–6, Alderman William Bayard wished to raise cash by selling his farm, of one hundred and fifty acres, on the western side of Broadway and near the city. He devised the scheme of offering them in lots of twenty-five by one hundred feet; only twenty-five dollars was bid, and but few of them were sold. It was well for him—for very soon after feelings and opinions changed, and they who had bought for twenty-five dollars, sold out for one hundred dollars: and then, the impulse being given, the progressive rise has had no end.

A kinsman, G. T., told me, in 1828, that the out-lots of the city "went up" about twenty-one years before, when from the circumstances of trade, &c. they began to fall much, and soon after to rise again more than ever. He bought lots four years before at the rate of $850, which would now bring him $1,800. Twenty-one years ago he bought lots for $2,000 reluctantly, which he in six months after sold for $4,000. That purchaser kept it till four years ago at its minimum price, and sold it for $2,000! Some of his property, which five years ago he would have freely sold for $2,000, would now be valued at $12,000. The lot at the corner of Broadway and Maiden-lane was sold for $27,600, equal to $22 per square foot, This is, however, a rare circumstance, having had the accident of attaining to much front along the newly extended Broadway.

The Stuyvesants, Rutgers, Delancys, and others, have attained to great riches by the rapid and unexpected growth of New-York, voraciously calling on such "out town" landlords for their farms at any price! Old Mr. Janeway, who died lately, at fourscore, saw his few acres near the Chatham-street and Collect, grow in his long life and possession from almost nothing to a great estate. "While they slumbered and slept," their fortunes advanced without their effort or skill. Much the fact impresses the recollection of "Ecclesiasticus;" he saith, "There is one that laboreth and taketh pains and maketh haste, and is so much the more behind, (as many poor bankrupts know), and there is another that is slow and hath need of help, wanting ability, yet he is set up from his low estate!"

The head of Chatham street, where it joins the Bowery road, although now a hill, has been cut down in modern times twelve feet. From this point, following the line of Division street and thence down to the river, on the line of Catherine street, was formerly Col. Rutger's farm; it was opened as city lots about 36 or 38 years ago.

I found the once celebrated "tea water pump," long covered up and disused, again in use, but unknown, in the liquor store of a Mr. Fagan, 126 Chatham street; I drank of it to revive recollections.

I have been surprised to find, in so magnificent a city, such a mean collection of hovels, of feeble wooden fabric, as I see in the rear of the great City Hall and the stately houses along Chamber street; they lay on the line of Cross street, descending a present hill, formerly much higher and more rugged, having only foot-paths for clambering boys. The mean houses at the foot of the hill or street are now half buried in earth by the raising of the street ten feet; up to his neighborhood came once the little Collect; it forms the site generally of what was formerly Janeway's little farm.

The Magazine street here (because of the powder house once close by), now named Pearl, in continuation, as it runs towards the Hospital on Broadway, shows, I think, strong marks of having been at the period of the revolution, the utmost verge of city hopes. The range of Beekman and Vesey street had once bounded their expectations; and lastly, they extended to the natural lines of Pearl street as it crosses the city, and was there formed at the foot of the hills on its southern side. Before the Magazine street was formed, it was so essentially the imaginary line which bounded the Police of Justice, &c., that it was usual to designate the limits by the vague name of "the fresh water" side of the city. Thus referring to the great Kolch and its course of marshes, as separating all beyond in a terra incognita.

The houses No. 13 and 15 on Elm street, near the corner of Duane street, are singular evidence of modern innovation. They were originally good two story houses, and are now filled up in Elm street, nearly to their roofs.

In the rear of No. 48 Frankford street, is now a very ancient tar yard. This street, down to Ferry street, and from William street over to Jacob's street, is the region of what was formerly tan yards, and originally Beekman's swamp. An old man near here, said he remembered to have shot ducks here formerly. The father of another had told him he often gathered huckleberries; and fifty or sixty years ago it was common to exercise here in skating.

Mr. Lydigg told me that when the tanneries about here accumulated great hills of tan, it was the material of the boys (preparing for the revolution by sham fights). Here great tan redoubts, piked with cow horns, were defended bravely by the Pearl street and Fly boys against the invading urchins from Broadway. Sometimes the open field was resorted to on the present Park, where missiles of thwacking force was dealt with vigorous arm.

Mr. Jacob Tabele, aged 87, said that in his early days he heard much speaking of Dutch among the people and along the streets. He saw no lamps in the streets when a boy.

The powder house he remembered. A powder house, called the Magazine, on a rising ground (a kind of island) at the Collect.

In Nicholas Bayard's woods he often shot numerous pigeons.

He remembered they used to burn lime from oyster shells on the Park commons. This agrees with what Mr. Brower said, who imputed the name of Collect to the low Dutch for burnt lime; but it is more probable Kolch was the true name, from its meaning "fresh water" there.

He remembered ship-yards between Beekmans and Burling's Slips.

There was once some small houses of wood, where is now St. Paul's Church.

He has seen river water flow through the sewer up the Maiden lane as high as Olstein's blacksmith shop on the triangular square.

There was a very high hill, once called "Bayard's Mount," on which the Americans built a fort, and called it Bunker Hill, in the time of the revolution, now cut down. It stood on present Grand street, a little east of Centre market.

He remembered the "ferry house" so called, high up Broad street; had heard that the creek once run up there. The sign was a boat with iron oars. It was an inn with such a sign in his time.

He remembered seeing the block houses in a line of palisades, quite across the island; they went in a line from the back of Chambers street. They were of logs about one story high. They being empty, were often used by Indians who made and sold baskets &c. there. So said Ebbets also.

He remembered when boats could freely pass along the space now occupied by large trees on the Battery ground.

He well remembered the ancient City Hall (Stadt Huys) at the head of Cœnties Slip; said he often heard it had been used as a fort in Leister's civil war against the real fort at the Battery. He had often seen a ball then shot at it, and which was left in the side wall of the house (pulled down by Tunis Quick in 1828), on the south-west corner of Pearl street and Cœnties Slip. That ball is now in the possession of Dr. Mitchell, as a relic.

There were market houses at every one of the slips in his time; the one at the foot of Wall street, nigh the Tontine, was called the Meal Market.

Said he often heard of Lindley Murray (the grammarian) having leaped across Burling's Slip (about 21 feet) with a pair of fowls in his hands as he came from market. He believed it, and others spoke of it to me as true, and that his lameness afterwards was imputed to his efforts.

Mr. Tabele said there were but few streets paved. Broadway and other streets had all their gutter ways in the middle.

He remembered the Oswego Market in Broadway, opposite to Liberty street. When demolished, another was placed at the west end of Maiden Lane.

The Bear Market was the only one on the North River side. It took its name from the fact of the first meat ever sold in it having been bear meat, killed as the bear was swimming from the neighborhood of Bergen shore.

William street, from John street northwards, used to be called Horse and Cart street, from an inn near there having such a sign.

Mr. Thorburn, the seedman, told me that when they were digging in Broadway to lay the Manhattan pipes they came to the posts of the city gate once at Wall street. He also showed me a rarity in the first directory ever made for New-York, in the year 1786. The very names of that day are curious; so few then who were foreigners. Such was the novelty or uselessness of a directory then, when every one knew his neighbor, that no other was attempted till the year 1796; that one Mr. Thorburn also possesses.

Mr. Thorburn's seed-house is a curiosity itself—a rare conception on his part; and presenting to the eye of the walking passenger along the streets, a little rus in urbe.

An ancient house at the corner of Beaver lane and Broadway, of original two stories high, has its cellar wall exposed out of ground, thus showing the cutting down of Broadway six to eight feet at least. If we keep the idea of that elevation, we may form some idea of the primitive elevation of the ground whereon the fort stood; aged men have told me they thought the highest elevation of the parapet walls was about equal to the walls of the present houses near there.

Mr. Daniel J. Ebbets, aged seventy-six, who has been a very observant youth, and is now an intelligent gentleman of lively mind has helped me to many facts.

He says, the present Bowling Green was once an oblong square, and was well surrounded with large locust trees.

As late as the year 1787, he had assisted to draw a seine on the beach, where runs the present Greenwich street, say from Beaver lane to Battery, there they caught many fish and much of herring; the beach was beautiful; there boys and horses were wont to bathe and sport in the wave. A street to be there never entered the head of the sportive youth. A large rock (see it on Lyne's map) stood ont in the middle of present Greenwich street, then in the water, on which was a kind of rude summer-house, much to the mind and fancy of the boys; affording them a resort of much frolic and youthful glee.

RICHARD O'GORMAN'S LECTURE.

From the Sunday Dispatch.

Richard O'Gorman, Jr., lectured before the Catholic Library Association, at the Tabernacle, on Thursday evening last, on "The Days of Chivalry." The audience was of good size, the lecture a highly interesting and eloquent one, and received with the most rapturous applause. The lecturer began by saying that he owed an apology for occupying the position, and when the Society did him the honor to invite him to address them, was really puzzled to find a subject upon which they were not as well informed as himself. Of the Present it was not necessary to say anything additional, self-complacent and arrogant as it is. Of the Future we could but speculate—one as well as another. But something remained to be done for the Past—the contemned and slighted Past, generally voted old fogy and slow, a time when there was neither steam nor telegraph, newspapers nor clipper ships. But it might be that all this was overstrained, and that the world had not improved as much as it had advanced. He proposed to take up the Days of Chivalry, and show that in many regards they were not a whit behind this boasting age, that manhood was then as noble and self-sacrificing as now, and that the ages had all the light they demanded. The lecturer traced earnestly and forcibly the fall of the Roman empire—the overrunning of Europe by military conquerors; the founding of kingdoms among them. Then sprang strife and contention, bloodshed and bitter hate, the only law that of the sword. Upon this harsh discord fell a softening influence, that of the Church of Christ, and Rome the second began to rule the world as Rome the first had done. It came from the Catacombs, and lit up the world with glory. Goth and Hun and Visigoth found a common bond, and Christendom was established. Soon to strengthen this came a common bond of dander—the threatening of the Mahometan power. The lecturer rapidly sketched the rise of the deception of Mecca, its rapid success, the conquering of India, crossing the Mediterranean into Spain, and bursting upon France in the time of old Charles Martel. But Christendom was prepared to meet the shock, and at Tours three hundred thousand Moslems bit the dust and the waves were rolled back and Europe delivered.

In the course of his remarks he graphically sketched the origin of the Normans—(Rolf, the early filibuster, who being too large to ride on horseback, was prophetically surnamed "Walker!") the descent upon England, the subjugation of the Saxons in a single battle by the Normans—though he said that they had been seven hundred years subduing a smaller island to the west. Then followed the institution of knighthood—a mingling of bravery and devotion, of manly strength and the very tenderness of women. The lecturer graphically depicted the origin and progress of the Crusades, and showed the advantages which accrued to the world through them. At last, the lecturer said, the mission of the preservation of Europe was accomplished in the life of chivalry, and it fell into decay. The Knight of La Mancha became its type, and now it was looked back upon with ridicule—by the men of this fast age. And yet the wisdom of this was doubtful. There was something more necessary in the world than a cold utilitarianism. The days of chivalry, the lecturer said, were gone, their blades rusted, their banners tattered and moulded, even their kingdoms gone to decay; but their spirit lived yet, and he conjured all true men to bear it proudly, be gallant men, as they of old were belted knights, without stain and without dishonor, without fear and without reproach.

BRITAIN BREAKS THE TREATY.

From the Dublin Nation.

England is violating—openly, audaciously violating the Treaty of Peace; and Austria, spiritless Austria, is following her treacherous example. England occupies at this present moment the position in the Black Sea which Russia occupied previous to the war. Austria occupies the position in the Principalities which Russia also held previous to the war. The avowed objects of the war were to free the Principalities, not merely from Russian domination, but from all foreign domination whatsoever; and to neutralise the Black Sea. Austria now holds military occupation of the Principalities, and England's fleets rule the waters of the Black Sea.

What now becomes of the talk of Russian aggression—Russian ambition? For her occupation of the Principalities, Russia had the sanction of a treaty—Austria's occupation is in contravention of the very letter of the Treaty of Peace. Russia's position in the Black Sea previous to the declaration of war, had for years been recognised and sanctioned by the world. England now maintains her fleet in open contempt of the letter and the spirit of the Treaty of Paris.

The attempt on the part of England to justify her outrageous conduct by insinuating that Russia has not observed the Treaty of Peace, is a lie—a mean, British lie. Russia has observed, with scrupulous fidelity, every article of the Treaty. The dispute about Bolgrad and Serpents Island, she wishes to submit to the Congress of Paris, and has actually invited that Congress to reasemble, in order that it may pronounce a decision. Whatever that decision may be, Russia declares her willingness to accept. But what does England? She opposes the reassembling of the Congress. Conscious of the injustice of her cause, she does not wish to submit it to the abjudication of a lawful tribunal. Austria, meanly overlooking the injuries which at the hands of England she has sustained, is base enough to become her ally in perfidy.

The conduct of England has drawn forth the censure, the hearty and unanimous censure of the French press. The Anglo-French Alliance is broken, it is at an end; it never can be reconstructed. Thank God for this; it was an alliance that boded ill to the cause of human freedom.

The time has now come to test what metal the Emperor of the French is composed of. If he allow England thus to violate with impunity the treaty which France purchased with so much blood and treasure; if he tamely submit to the indignity offered to him and his gallant nation, there is no foul epithet which the English press ever applied to him which he will not have richly merited. If, however, he proves himself to be in this emergency the true impersonation of the great French idea, if he shows himself to be in reality the nephew of his uncle—'le neveu de son oncle'—the proud Spaniard will cheer him; Russia will sustain him; Germany will applaud him; America will recognise his greatness; and Ireland may yet see another victory and vengeance like that of Fontenoy.

THE PEERAGE OF TIRCONNELL.

From the Wexford Independent.

It is reported that the Tirconnell Peerage is about to be revived in the person of Lord Talbot de Malahide. Why this selection should be made to the prejudice of the old Milesian Family to which the dignity originally and essentially belonged (and by some members of whom it is still borne on the Continent even to the present day) cannot be matter of surprise to those who have watched the undeviating rule of action of our conquerors, since the earliest periods of British domination. It is indeed in keeping with that Saxon policy towards Ireland which strives to abase its ancient race—"the mere Irish"—and crush every germ of its Hiberno-Gælic nationality.

We say essentially belonged—for the reader of Irish history cannot be unmindful of the fact, that that portion of the North of Ireland formerly dehominated Tirconnell, now the County of Donegal, was the territory of the O'Donnells, of which they were the Kings, or Princes, or Chiefs. It derived its name from Conall Gubban, the progenitor of the O'Donnells, who was the son of Niall, of the Hostages, monarch of Ireland, about A.D. 400. Tir Conaill or Tirconnell signifying the territory of Conall.

There seems to be a strange fatality attending this Title as attached to the British Peerage, for it has passed through five different families since its first creation, and became successively extinct in each for want of male issue.

After the battle of Kinsale in 1602, and flight of Red Hugh O'Donnell, one of the greatest men Ireland ever produced, his brother Rory, having espoused the cause of the English and made his submission to the British Sovereign, ignobly relinquished the chieftaincy for a British Peerage, and was created in 1603, Earl of Tirconnell. Rory having soon after entered into rebellion, was attainted by act of Parliament; but had even this attainder not taken place the title would have become extinct a few generations after from failure of male issue.

The Earldom of Tirconnell was afterwards given to one of the family of the Fitzwilliams, in which, on failure of male issue, it likewise became extinct.

The next revival of this Peerage, was in the person of the celebrated Colonel Richard Talbot, who was created Duke of Tirconnell by James the Second. He died also without issue, in Limerick, in 1691, and was buried in the Cathedral. It is probably from this Talbot that the present noble expectant founds his pretensions.

One of the Brownlow family was then honored with the Peerage and created Earl of Tirconnell; and here again, as in the former instances, it lapsed from the same natural causes.

Subsequently, in 1761, Baron Carpenter was elevated to the Earldom of Tirconnell; and, a very few years ago, his descendant the last Earl, died, leaving no male issue, thereby causing for the fifth time the extinction of this British Peerage.

The delegates of the Tipperary Bank creditors have agreed to the principle of a compromise, and also to a recommendation to the creditors not to take proceedings. In the meantime, however, all sorts of proceedings are going on in every one of the courts, and the lawyers are having their pickings off the carcase. The multitude of law proceedings tearing away in various directions is enough to take any one's breath away, and raise a very reasonable doubt whether any thing will be left for the luckless creditors.

Mr. Allan Quirey, a farmer of Monkstown, met his death by accident, on the Ballymena Railway. He had been at a fair in Carrickfergus, and having arrived at Whiteabbey in a few minutes afterwards, was run over by a luggage train. Death must have been instantaneous, as the head was severed from the body.

At last Monday's market, says the Dundalk Democrat, a large number of young men and women attended to seek situations as farm servants. We were glad to observe that their appearance had been much improved. The wages for ploughmen ranged between £7 and £8 a year; and for boys' and girls' services, a considerable advance in wages has taken place.

Mr. George Little, cashier of the Midland Great Western Railway Terminus, Dublin, committed suicide in his office, by cutting his throat from ear to ear. He had locked the door before he committed the dreadful deed, and when it was burst open, he was found lying on his right side in a pool of blood. No reason is given for the rash act.

A charge of murder has been preferred against Patrick Flaherty, Michael Kane, and Laurence Burke, of Galway. It appeared that on or about the 4th ult., a tinker named Greahan, from Shell lane, was drinking with some, if not all, of the accused parties, in a house in Mainguard street, and that some difference arose between Greahan and some other of the parties while drinking there, the result being that Greahan went out, and on the other parties leaving he flung a stone at the person who had offended him, but instead of striking him, it hit Laurence Burke, his own drinking companion. The blow knocked the man dowu and left him in a state of insensibility for some time. Greahan went away; and the next place he was seen was in the basin of the canal where he was found drowned the following day. A woman named Devit now comes forward and proves that on the night of the quarrel she saw Greahan crossing the West Bridge, near eleven o'clock, followed by Flaherty, Kane and Burke, who pursued him through Parkavera, and that she saw Flaherty and Kane throw the unfortunate man into the canal, after he had called out to save his life. This witness is a person of immoral character, but she states that she told the occurrence she had witnessed to another person of her own class on the night of Greahan's wake, and some other person subsequently. There are some discrepancies in her testimony, but on the other hand, there had been no reward offered for her evidence that would lead to a conviction. The magistrates have sent the case for trial to the next assizes.

At the Waterford petty sessions, two respectably-dressed young men, named respectively, Wm. Harris, said to be of Liverpool, and Henry Milford, of Dublin, described as sailors, were brought up in custody of Sergeant S. Clair and John Harrison, police constable, on a charge of having broken into the shop of Mr. James Moseley, jeweller, Quay, on that morning, and taken therefrom a quantity of jewelry. Both prisoners were committed for trial to the next quarter sessions.

The Kilkenny Moderator reports that the stables of Mr. O'Donnell, near the Military Barracks, was set on fire, owing to the carelessness of a servant who left a candle sticking against the wall, and the valuable race-horse and hunter, Tyro, who won the first heat at the recent Tramore steeple-chase, was shockingly scorched about the head, stomach, and legs, so as that the poor animal survives in a most precarious and suffering condition.

The Waterford Chronicle reports that Professor Melville, of the Galway Queen's College, left Waterford, where he had been lecturing, without a formal vote of thanks having been passed him in public.

TO THE PUBLIC!

Consumption---Watkinson's Pulmonacia.

A SAFE, reliable family medicine, warranted not to contain a particle of mercury or any other mineral poison; not a nine day's wonder got up to sell and humbug the public. He has used it for years in private families of friends, and now, at the urgent request of hundreds who have seen its remarkable cures, where every other remedy has failed, he offers it to the public to benefit and relieve those suffering with that fatal disease, so inherent to our changeable climate, carrying off its thousands to an early grave—Consumption. It has effected some of the most remarkable cures ever heard of; how some dear friend was saved from death, when all hope was given up, now lives and enjoys good health. Its rare qualities are not only in relieving consumptive patients, but for all diseases of the lungs, racking nervous cough, night sweats, bronchial affections of the throat, internal inflammation, where the blood is impure, it has no equal. The discoverer of Pulmonacia is Richard Watkinson, a gentleman of well-known standing in Philadelphia and New-York. Those that are acquainted with him know there is no quackery or humbug about it, as the number of certificates that can be obtained at the office will satisfy the most incredulous as to its value.

The "Adventures of a Roving Diplomatist" is the piquant title of the long-looked for book of the Chevalier Wikoff, which is destined to create, perhaps, the liveliest literary sensation of the season. The author, from the eccentric nature of his career, has become invested with a romantic prestige that renders him to serious minds an object of curiosity, whilst the lovers of the marvellous regard him with unusual and peculiar interest"—Herald, New-York.

NEW MUSIC FOR PARLOR AND SCHOOL.

THE

Musical Bouquet, or Institute Choir.

A New and Tasteful Collection of Songs, Duets, Trios, and Chorusses, with a complete and perspicuous Course of Elementary Instruction, designed for the Social Circle and the Schoolroom.

By William B. Bradbury and Charles C. Converse.

Price....63cts.

This beauiful work contains a much higher grade of Music than the ordinary collections of the kind. Most of the pieces are new, and are particularly rich in melody and chaste in arrangement. The accompanying words are also generally elevated, pure, and replete with the spirit of poetry. Mr. Bradbury's reputation as a composer will be a sufficient guarantee of the originality, grace, and animation of his part of the work; and in Mr. Converse the musical public will not fail to discern the indications of genius.

The Knickerbocker Magazine says:

"We have here something new, and something fair to the eye. In three points this work may challenge successful competition—first, in the character of its melodies; secondly, the beauty and tenderness of the words, with some exceptions; and finally in mechanical execution."

The Churchman characterizes it as "A capital assortment of songs, duets, trios, and choruses, including most of the popular productions of the day."

The Boston Journal commends its new music as "very pretty and well arranged."

Price 63 cts. Sent post-paid on receipt of the price.

Copies sent to teachers at half price for examination, with a view to its use in classes.

MISCELLANEOUS.

National Characteristics.—It has been said that men will betray the characteristics of their nation in their conversation. It chanced that this point was under discussion by a group of passengers and the captain of one of our clipper ships, during a recent passage across the Atlantic. It was a fine day, and most of the passengers, both cabin and steerage, were upon the deck. The group above mentioned had been commenting upon the bluntness of the English, cautious shrewdness of the Scotch, and the ready wit of the Irish, when the captain, taking the segar from his lips, pointed towards the forward part of the ship, where, at different points, he indicated a native of each of the three nations. He then proposed to wager that he would ask each of them the same question separately, and that the answer of each would be an illustration of his national characteristic. This proposition being acceded to, it was decided that the question should be, "What will you take to climb to the masthead, and remain all night there?" and the party moved forward to put the experiment to the test.

The first one accosted was the Englishman, who was slowly pacing the deck. "John," said the captain, "what will you take to climb to the masthead, and remain there all night?" John glanced upwards an instant, and then exclaimed with characteristic bluntness, "I'll take five pounds." A smile from the group proclaimed the success of this trial.

The Scotchman was next approached; he was a sandy-complexioned, sharp-eyed fellow, and was seated upon a sea-chest darning a rent in an old pair of pantaloons. "Sawney," said the captain, jingling the silver in his pockets as he approached him, "what will you take to climb to the masthead, and remain there all night?" Sawney's ears pricked up at the sound of the coin, and as he slowly and cautiously measured the height with his eye, without rising from his seat, he replied, with the shrewdness of a true Scotchman, "I dinna ken, mon; what'll ye gie?"

The last one approached was the Irishman, who was carelessly leaning over the bulwarks, humming one of the lively melodies of his country; his old battered caubeen was cocked jauntily over his right eye, while his left was employed in executing a series of expressive winks at a group of the female steerage passengers who were upon the other side of the deck, "Patrick, my boy, what would you take to climb to the masthead, and remain there all night?" asked the captain. The Hibernian's blue eye twinkled as he turned it upward, and a look of irresistible comicality played upon his phiz, as he replied—"Shure I think I'd take my death of cowld, your 'onor."

The Power of Seven.—Rome on the seven hills had seven kings. Seven times Jacob bowed before his brother Esau. It is also the number of purification, as when Naaman washed seven times in the river Jordan. Such illustration might be almost infinitely multiplied. Man, as we have before said, was assumed to grow by sevens. They were arranged thus:—After the first seven months, the first teeth come; after the first seven years, they fall, and others come in place of them; after the second seven years, puberty comes; after the third comes perfect womanhood and manhood. We say, therefore, to this day in England, when three times seven are complete, at twenty-one, a person is of age. During this seven years, he has been increasing in length; during the fourth seven years, he grows no more in length, but increases in breadth, and completes the definition of his perfect shape. During the fifth seven years, the man, perfect in form, is perfect in vigor, and during the sixth seven years, retains his powers unabated. In the seventh period of seven years, prudence is perfected, and thus during the period expressed by seven times seven, man is at his completest. Finally, when we come to ten times seven, at which ends the multiplication of the simple numbers, man has attained the appointed number of his days, three score and ten.

The Exeter (English) Gazette mentions the discovery of the immense value of a blue stone which had been for some years in the possession of Mr. Barstow Taylor, of Totnes, and who deemed it only an ordinary pebble until a few weeks ago, when his attention was more minutely drawn to it from the fact that a piece clipped from the principal lump was found to cut readily through a piece of glass. Upon this Mr. Taylor submitted the stone to a lapidary, who pronounced this stone to be a blue diamond of the second water, and of more than £5,000 in value.

A good substitute for potatoes has been introduced in France, the Clætophyllum bulbosum, yielding an abundance of tubers, of from half an ounce to an ounce each, very wholesome, and with a delicate vanilla flavor, containing twenty-one per cent. of starch. The Clætophyllum sativum is also said to be an excellent salad.

Electro-Magnetic Baths.—The Electro-Magnetic Baths having become permanently established as a remedial agent for the cure of Inflammatory and Chronic Rheumatism, Gout, Stiff and Enlarged Joints, Paralysis, Ulcers, Tic Toloreux, Neuralgia, Pain in the Limbs, &c. &c., and for the positive extraction of Mercury and other Mineral Poisons from the human system, the Messrs. Sloan & Co. take this method of informing the public that they have fitted up and opened an establishment at No. 53 Sixth Avenue, where the Baths will be constantly in operation, under the care and direction of Dr. G. H. Doyle, Homeopathic Professor of Medicine. To those unacquainted with "Electro-Magnetism" as applied to the cure of disease, reduction and extraction of mineral poisons, &c., we would say that as a means of cure for the above enumerated diseases, it has received the almost universal endorsement of the various Academies of Medicine throughout Europe and the United States, and that the reduction of Metals by a Voltaic Current, is no new science: it is the application of the fact to its extraction from the system for which we claim originality. In it we dismiss all theories—we leave nothing to chance—we are not led by blind experience, but we follow unerring and never failing principles.

Thousands who are now suffering from what they imagine to be Rheumatic Pains in the Joints, Bones, &c, are in fact suffering from the injurious exhibition of mineral poisons taken probably many years previously. To such we are positive in our promise of a permanent and speedy cure. Females laboring under complaints incidental to their sex, will find in this remedy a means of relief at once pleasant and satisfactory. A competent lady in constant attendance for their special accommodation.

Persons afflicted in any way with sickness, debility, &c. will do well to call at the office, examine the Baths, and receive full explanation of the treatment pursued. SLOAN & CO., 53 Sixth Avenue,

THE GREAT RUSSIAN REMEDY.

Pro Bono Publico.

"EVERY MOTHER SHOULD HAVE A BOX IN THE HOUSE HANDY IN CASE OF ACCIDENTS TO THE CHILDREN."

REDDING'S RUSSIAN SALVE. It is a Boston remedy of thirty years' standing, and is recommended by physicians. It is a sure and speedy cure for Burns, Piles, Boils, Corns, Felons, Chilblains, and old Sores of every kind.

For Fever Sores, Ulcers, Itch, Scald Head, Nettle Rash, Bunions, Sore Nipples, (recommended by nurses); Whitlows, Stiles, Festers, Flea Bites, Spider Stings, Frozen Limbs, Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore and Cracked Lips, Sore Nose, Warts and Flesh Wounds, it is a most valuable remedy and cure, which can be testified to by thousands who have used it in the city of Boston and vicinity for the last thirty years.

In no instance will this Salve do an injury, or interfere with a physician's prescriptions. It is made from the purest materials, from a recipe brought from Russia, of articles growing in that country, and the proprietors have letters from all classes, clergymen, physicians, sea captains, nurses, and others who have used it themselves and recommend it to others.

REDDING'S RUSSIAN SALVE is put in large tin boxes, stamped on the cover with the picture of a horse and a disabled soldier, which picture is also engraved on the wrapper. PRICE, 25 Cents a Box. Sold at all the stores in town or country, or may be ordered of any wholesale druggist.

Daguerreotypes.

Mark the Facts!—J. GURNEY'S establishment, No. 349 Broadway, corner of Leonard street, is the oldest and most extensive in the United States. GURNEY was the first to introduce the Art of Photography in this city. GURNEY has recently made important alterations and improvements in his establishment. GURNEY has now greater facilities for producing finer work in every branch than has heretofore been produced in this country. GURNEY has still in his employ the best of his old artists. GURNEY has recently added to the above a talented corps of American, French, and German artists. GURNEY'S colored Photographs of all sizes need only to be seen to be appreciated; they speak for themselves. GURNEY'S plain, unretouched Photographs were never equaled—so say artists and the best judges. GURNEY'S Daguerreotypes are universally pronounced superior productions. GURNEY has received more testimonials for his skill than any other artist in the profession. GURNEY received the only medal for Photographic productions at the late Paris Exposition—consequently, GURNEY stands at the head of the world in the Photographic Art. GURNEY has not removed any branch of his business to any part of the city. GURNEY has no connection with any other establishment in any part of the city. GURNEY attends personally to his patrons and friends, and has done so for the last sixteen years. GURNEY will be most happy to continue that attention, and will still endeavor to please all who may favor him with a visit to his Photographic Palace of Art. J. GURNEY,

FACTS

THAT NEED NO MARKING.

Progression.

From Humphrey's Photographic Journal of Sept. 1856.]

We do not approve of the plan of puffing the members of the Photographic profession by way of personals. This may do very well when one is trying to bring his works into favor with such as are susceptible to flattery, and measure out their support according to the amount of editorial ink used as bait. We feel confident that those who best know will agree with us as that it is no puffing, when we can say with so much truth, that the Photographic Art this day owes, in no small degree, its position in this country to Mr. C. D. FREDRICKS, a gentleman who was the first to introduce the Photographic process upon an extensive scale in America. Previous to his establishing himself here, he visited Europe, and, with an enterprise worthy of imitation, he was not satisfied with first securing what knowledge he could himself gain, but also engaged the services of several of the most eminent Parisian Artists. He then, in connection with Mr. GURNEY, opened an establishment on a plan unequaled in the world.

After succeesfully following his profession, in connection with Mr. G., for some time, he has opened a "Temple of Art" in this City, under his own professorship and supervision. We have honestly and candidly presented the foregoing, feeling that is justly due to a fellow-laborer.

CHARLES D. FREDRICKS, late GURNEY & FREDRICKS, Photographs, Daguerreotypes, Ambrotypes, &c., No. 585 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel.

FACTS WHICH ARE KNOWN.—PHOTOGRAPHS DAGUERREOTYPES, AMBROTYPES, &c.—The undersigned having removed the Photograph department and his Parisian artists from his old place of business, No. 349 Broadway, to his new and magnificent establishment, No. 585 Broadway, would call the attention of public to the fact that his Galleries, and the pictures made in them, are superior to anything before exhiited. Those desiring Photograps, Daguerreotypes, or Ambrotypes, executed by artists of refined taste, would do well to call and judge for themselves. Reception Rooms on the first floor, and are open from 8 A. M., to 10 P. M. CHARLES D. FREDRICKS,

Brady's Photographic Palace of Art.—Who would not desire to possess a memento, so perfect and life-like of a dead relative or friend, as can be furnished by the photographic art? What more acceptable present can be given or received than one of Brady's splendid, almost speaking portraits, which reflect the expression as well as the features of their originals? Those who desire beautiful portraits of the members of their family, should take care to have them in the highest style of art. Strangers visiting this city, will find no spot more interesting than BRADY'S DAGUERRIAN GALLERY AND PALACE OF PHOTOGRAPHIC ART, No. 205 Broadway.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

¡WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparen expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

ELIZABETHAN ALE.

MEDICAL men now very generally recommend the occasional use of pure ale to those who are in need of nourishment; and it is undoubtedly the most wholesome beverage for general use that can be found. This is not a new idea. In Queen Elizabeth's time our ancestors universally consumed it—from Elizabeth herself, in her palace, to the farmer in the field. In those days, adulterated wines and fiery liquors may be said to have been unknown, and very heavy penalties were enacted against using anything except malt and hops in brewing. It is not at all extravagant to assert, that the average duration of the life of a large portion of our race is a third less than it was two or three hundred years ago, and this is chiefly attributable to what we eat and what we drink. Even now the heartiest people that can be found are from the rural districts of England, who yet follow the old fashioned diet.

All who use ale, whether as a beverage or for the purpose of nourishment, will find the Elizabethan Ale most excellent. Being made on the Scotch plan, it is as pure and wholesome, (if not equal in flavor) as the imported, while its cost is but little more than a common article. Families and retailers supplied at 120 WATER STREET, one door above Wall. oc4m3

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., July 10, 1856.

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a Subscriber to Mr. O'Mahony's translation of "Foras Feasa ar Erinn."

That is a book long wanted, and which the Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Elliott had lived, it would have been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America, a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes as Mr. O'Mahony. I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

Faithfully yours, JOHN MITCHEL.

SAVAGE'S '98 AND '48.

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

12mo., cloth, $1.

There is no one work which gives the spirit of the memorable periods to illustrate which the author has devoted the present volume. It contains vivid and carefully collated descriptions of the principal battles of the United Irishmen of '98, and a clear statement of the circumstances which led to the differences between "Old Ireland" and "Young Ireland," the line of national policy adopted by the latter, with biographical notices, &c. &c.

The third edition has been very usefully improved. Forty pages have been added, embracing an Appendix and a copious Index, containing nearly twelve hundred references to political facts, military movements, and personal allusions to the text. The Appendix is peculiarly valuable to the historical student, in giving the original addresses issued by the national bodies in Ireland during the revolutionary months of '48, including those issued by the Irish Confederation, the Protestant Repeal Association, the Trades and Citizens of Dublin, the Students, etc., to the French Republic, to the People of Ireland, to the Protestants of Ulster, to the Political Clubs on Trial by Jury, and against Lord Clarendon. They form a chapter of the European History of that eventful year to which every future writer on the subject must refer; and as they can be found in no other publication, their presence here must greatly enhance the historical value of this work.

WILLIAMS & GUION'S

Old Black Star Line of Packets. 1856.

Passage from any part of Great Britain and Ireland, secured at the lowest possible rates by this old-established line, sailing from Liverpool to New-York every five days, comprising the following magnificent Ships:

Ships.	Captains.	Tonage.
AUSTRALIA,	Smith,	2,000
BRIDGEWATER (new),	Barstow,	2,000
CULTIVATOR (new),	Austin,	2,000
CYNOSURE,	Bray,	2,000

THORNTON (new),	Collins,	2,000
TICONDEROGA,	Boyle,	1,400
UNIVERSE,	Cave,	2,000
VANGUARD,	Norton,	1,800

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of the departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; or persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

REMITTANCES TO IRELAND.

IRISH EMIGRANT SOCIETY,
Office, 51 Chambers street.

NOTICE.—The recent failures, by which a large amount of Bills remitted from this country to friends in Ireland, has been returned unpaid, afford to this Society the opportunity, and at the same time impose upon it the duty of informing the public, that such losses would have been prevented if the parties purchasing Bills had availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Society.

For the purpose of entire protection a fund is constantly kept on deposit in the Bank of Ireland, against which this Society issues its drafts, payable at sight (from sums of £1 sterling and upwards), on the Bank and all its branches, and has thereby for the last Ten Years afforded a mode of remittance perfectly safe and unquestionable.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, New-York, Aug. 18, 1856.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That the following ordinance, relative to express wagons, carts, cartmen, &c., &c., having been adopted, its provisions will hereafter be enforced.

FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

AN ORDINANCE

To amend an Ordinanae entitled "An Ordinance for the licensing, and otherwise regulating the use and employment of express wagons, carts and cartmen, &c., &c., approved by the Mayor June 2, 1851."

The Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New-York, in Common Council convened, do ordain as follows:

That section 2 of said Ordinance, relating to carts and cartmen, be amended, so as to read as follows:

SECTION 2.—The Mayor shall from time to time license and appoint so many and such persons as he may think proper, to set up and keep public carts in said city, Provided, that no one person shall be so licensed to keep more than three such public carts.

And he shall also license so many and such persons as he may think proper, to be public cartmen of said city, and he may revoke or suspend any or all such licenses at his pleasure. All persons licensed as foresaid, to keep public carts, shall be deemed to be public cartmen, within the meaning of this Ordinance; but it shall not be lawful for any person to receive or to hold a license to keep public carts, or to be a public cartman, unless he be a citizen of the United States, and resident within the State of New-York, and is the actual owner of the cart or carts, with good horses therefor, so licensed to be kept as public carts; and the Mayor may examine, under oath, all persons applying for or holding any such license, or the renewal thereof, touching their qualifications as aforesaid, and all licences other than to persons so qualified shall be void.

Adopted by the Board of Councilmen, May 9, 1856.
Adopted by the Board of Aldermen, July 15, 1856.
Approved by the Mayor July 30, 1856.

European News.

We have had by the Atlantic European dates to the 26th November. The political news present no new features; but commercial affairs seemed to be more prosperous.

Mr. James Wilson had addressed to Cyrus W. Field, Esq., of New York, an official notification that the British Government engages to furnish ships to take additional soundings for the Atlantic Telegraph, and verify those already made. Also to furnish ships to assist in laying the cable; and further undertake to guarantee four per cent. upon the capital of £350,000—equal to £14,000 sterling, until the company's earnings reach six per cent. after which the guarantee will be £10,000 per annum for twenty-five years, or such larger sum as the Government messages may amount to, if charged at the ordinary rates of tariff, and the United States Government make a similar arrangement, the messages of the two Governments to be sent in the order of priority of receipt.

Among the projects for the next session of Parliament the following is mentioned:

An Atlantic Telegraph Company will submit proposals for laying down and working an electric submarine telegraph between the western coast of Ireland and Newfoundland.

The extraordinary activity which prevails in the Russian shipbuilding establishments of the Black Sea has long since awakened the distrust of England, and that power has lately applied to France for making a joint representation to Russia on the subject, it being notorious that at this moment the Czar has twelve men of war in the Black Sea. But the Cabinet of the Tuilleries has not deemed such an interpellation opportune at the present time.

The Berlin Correspondenz Bureau announces the meeting of a new Congress, and asserts, on the faith of "well-informed persons," that, besides Austria and Prussia, the Germanic Diet will be represented there, but only to contribute to the carrying out of the measures which may be adopted. It is assured that several of the Secondary States expressed a wish to that effect in the debate which took place in the Diet on the Neufchatel question, and the opposition manifested on that occasion by Saxony to the views of Prussia seems to be connected with this question of the German States.

The Neuchatel affair begins to wear a dangerous aspect. Accounts from Berne announce the arrival there of the Prussian Envoy, M. de Sydo. He is the bearer of a stringent, if not peremptory note, demanding the release of the royalists, and further requiring or requesting, a categorical answer with the least possible delay. Up to the last moment symptoms were apparent of the Federal Government being disposed to accede. Advices from Berlin say, that unless the matter is settled before the coming of the Chambers, the King of Prussia will have to refer to the subject in language from which there will be no retreating hereafter. The Swiss journals state that the Federal Government is neglecting no measure which prudence can command forthe defence of the territory.

In regard to this question, the Berlin correspondent of the London Times, writing on the 20th Nov., says:

"Almost all letters from Paris correspondents contained in the papers of this morning state confidently that the Emperor had accepted the proposal, or complied with the request, made to him by General Dufour in the name of the Swiss Confederation, to act as mediator between it and Prussia in the Neuchatel matter, but that he had, at the same time, frankly stated his conviction that no mediation would be of any avail, unless the Confederation, as a preliminary step, at once set its Neufchatel prisoners at liberty, as an earnest of its good will to come to fair terms."

The London Spectator opened a powerful article on the state of the Anglo-French alliance with the following pertinent queries:

"Why, if the Emperor Napoleon is as hearty as ever in the English alliance, is the official antagonist of England, Count Walewski, at the head of the French Foreign Office? If the Emperor wishes to be understood, why does he employ a language of compliment to the new Russian Ambassador which suggests such equivocal inferences?"

From Paris we have not any stirring news of local character. The Debats announces that Marquis Antonini, the Neapolitan Envoy, received his passports on Friday, November 21, his departure was positively fixed for the 26th. The Assemblee Nationale, in an article six columns long, and headed "Let us be the friends, but not the tools, of England," replies to the attacks of the Times. Galignani states that the apology of the Fusionist paper leaves matters where they stood.

According to intelligence from Galatz, on Nov. 4, the European Commission on the Danube was officially constituted on that day, under the provisional Presidency of M. Bitter, the Prussian Commissioner. In conformity with instructions, Omar Pacha, the Turkish Commissioner, was appointed president, from his position as representative of the Sultan the sovereign of Moldavia, in which country the Commission is sitting. The plan of their future sittings was then settled. It was determined, at the demand of the French Commissioner, that the French gunboats, then at Galatz, should be sent to the Aljani banks, at the mouth of the Sulina, to re-establish order there, which was troubled in various ways; and that a Turkish war steamer, stationed at Sulina, should also repair to the same quarter with a similar object, and to take the requisite means to render the Aljani shallows again navigable.

Accounts from Athens to Nov. 14 announce the elections to have turned in favor of the Ministry, and that the allied troops would leave Greece soon after the return of King Otho.

The Paris Monteur contains a communication from Teheran, dated Oct. 22, by which it appears that nothing positive was known about the fate of Herat. It appears, however that the hopes entertained of getting possession of the city by friendly means were not realized. The data as to the real position of the besieged are exceedingly vague. It is said they suffer severely from famine, but that the Persian troops are little better off. Bokhara merchants, come from Herat within the last month, state that, at the time of their passing through the city, siege operations were scarcely perceptible, and that there was barely a blockade of the principal gates. Provisions, and even caravans, entered freely by all the other outlets.

The Paris Presse contains a significant announcement, in alluding to the Persian expedition. In the course of a description of the intentions attributed to the English Government in the Persian Gulf, which comprise the occupation of the Isle of Karrak, if claims that Island as belonging to France, saying:

"Karrak, it has been forgotten, belongs to France, in virtue of a treaty concluded in 1768 between M. Pyrault, our Consul at Bassora, and Kherim Khan, probably the wisest of the sovereigns who have reigned over Persia in modern times. This treaty is, doubtless, but little known; but that consideration does not diminish its importance, since no ulterior convention has abolished or modified it."

The Africa, from Liverpool, on the 29th ult., brings three days' later news from Europe than that we have already had by the Atlantic's mails. The only matter of interest is the firm stand which the glorious little Republic of Switzerland has taken on the Neufchatel affair. Prussia demanded the unconditional pardon of the royalist insurgents, and Switzerland directly refuses to comply with the demand. Austria, Bavaria, and Baden support Prussia.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says that a private telegraphic dispatch, received in Paris, announces the taking of Herat by the Persians.

A souvenir of an event in naval history has been presented by Admiral Wallis to the gun-room mess of the British frigate Shannon. The memorial consists of a box made from wood of the United States frigate Chesapeake, mounted in silver, and bearing the following inscription:

"Box made from part of a beam of the United States frigate Chesapeake, captured in single combat by her Majesty's frigate Shannon, in Boston Bay, U. S., 1st June, 1813. Presented to the gun-room mess of the Shannon, as a perpetual memorial of that action, by Rear-Admiral Provo Wallis, senior surviving Lieutenant."

A fearful accident happened in the Southampton docks about half-past 5 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, on board the Royal West India mail steamer Parana, when three persons were killed and nine wounded by the bursting of one of the boilers. This fearful and very unexpected event (an explosion of low-pressure marine boilers being a very uncommon occurrence,) created the greatest consternation.

It is understood that the question of adopting an exclusively gold standard is again occupying the attention of the French Government. The Bank of France begins to accumulate specie.

We read in the city article of the London Times: "It is stated that £315,000 out of the £350,000 required as the capital of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, by whom it is hoped to establish electric communication between England and America in the early part of next Summer, has already been subscribed. £100,000 has been taken in the United States, £104,000 in London, £71,000 in Liverpool, £25,000 in Manchester, £14,000 in Glasgow, and £1,000 in Leamington. On Friday next the shares are to be allotted."

Interesting from Spain.

A private letter from Madrid, of the 19th, mentions the following facts:—The question of the fusion with the family of Don Carlos is advancing towards a solution. It is the desire of Russia, as clearly manifested by Count Benkendorf. The Queen wishes to treat it as an affair in which her family only, and not the nation is in any way concerned. A few of her ministers are opposed to this manner of viewing the question; but the Queen laughs at her ministers, and is determined to settle the matter directly and without any intervention, save that of private agents speaking in her own name and on her own behalf. A person from London, who has lately been presented to the Queen, is, it appears, charged by the Infanta Don Juan to act on his behalf at the Palace. The Government has tried to intercept the correspondence, and with that view all the letters from abroad are examined carefully, but none have been found from the person alluded to. Eventually the Ministry will be obliged to do all that the Queen, acting under the inspiration of the King, may command them. The ministers who on every occasion are thus obliged to give way, endeavor restrain her Majesty. They wished the police to get up an emeute, in order to afford a pretext for strong measures of repression. The affair of Malaga has been the result, but the game is a dangerous one—our ministers may be the first consumed by the fire they would kindle. The state of the public funds is bad. The Government have endeavored to prevent the fall, but they are exhausted—they have not a real of money in the treasury, and are thinking of a loan. Some days since, a coup d'etat in favor of an absolutist system was prepared. The Court insisted that it should go on, but it was assured by a certain ex-minister that it was better to wait for the meeting of the Cortes and a parliamentary check sustained by General Narvaez. The Court, however, which is every day more and more anxious for it, and the person who now holds the greatest influence, (the son of a well known Carlist of high rank) and the King, urged by the clergy, agree in opinion with the rest of the Court. It is known that the Government is on the best understanding with the King of Naples, who is the channel of communication with the Pope, and an active correspondence is carried on between Madrid, Naples, and St. Petersburg.

The late Insurrection Malaga, Spain.

The following are the details of the insurrection at Malaga on the 12th:—Rumors were spread amongst the people that an insurrection had taken place at Madrid; that eighteen battalions had taken part in it against the Government; that Narvaez had been wounded; that the Queen had declared herself absolute: that it was the Government which kept up the price of bread; that the most oppressive privileges of the clergy were about to be re-established, &c. All this created a great commotion, the leaders of the demagogical party, resolved to take advantage of it to effect a rising, especially as the garrison had been weakened by the departure to Africa, two days before, of a battallion of the regiment of San Fernando. The authorities hearing of what was projected, kept the troops in their barracks ready to act, and placed detachments of artillery and the civil guard at the Gate of the Custom-house, and other important positions. At nightfall a mob collected, and proceeded towards the Custom-house, crying, "The Republic for ever!" A carbinier happening to meet them, was immediately put to death. Their numbers having increased, they invaded the Plaza de la Constitucion. The military governor immediately published the following bando:

"Whereas, The people have made use of fire-arms against a carbinier, have cried "The Republic forever," and uttered other cries exciting to revolt, I hereby order, 1. Any assemblage exceeding two persons, and which shall not immediately disperse on being commanded so to do, shall be dispersed by force of arms. 2. No one can carry arms, even in virtue of previous authorization, unless the exercise of his profession shall require it. 3. Whoever shall spread subversive rumors, or do the least act of a nature calculated to endanger public security, shall be tried at once and shot. Inhabitants of Malaga! fully decided, as well as all the other authorities of this town, on whose co-operation I confidently count, to maintain at every price public tranquillity and to defend property, I say woe to any person who shall make the least encroachments on these objects—all the rigor of the law shall fall on his head."

Notwithstanding this bando, the people contined in the Plaza de la Constitucion, and the military governor at the head of his staff went to the Plaza to exhort them to disperse, but he was received by a discharge of musketry, and narrowly escaped being killed. On this a body of troops was marched to the square, and they dispersed the assemblage by force. The insurgents then went to different parts of the town, and especially the Faubourgs del Perchel and de la Trinidad. In these faubourgs they prepared for resistance; many of them were armed with muskets which they had preserved from the recent disarming of the National Guard, and with others pillaged from the shop of a gunsmith named Barerra, also with pistols and poignards, and they threw up barricades. When the men charged to stick up copies of the bando appeared they were fired at, amidst cries of "The Republic forever!" Presently the troops arrived, and they found themselves between two bands of insurgents. An engagement commenced, and it was sustained with great vigor on both sides until 11 o'clock in the evening, when the barricades were carried by the troops at the point of the bayonet, and the insurgents were dispersed in all directions. In the Calles de la Aurora and de la Guimbarda, barricades, formed of carts upset were defended by citizens of the middle class of society. Several of the insurgents were killed or wounded, the troops had some men wounded. About twenty of the insurgents were arrested with arms in their hands, and a court-martial immediately assembled to try them. The military governor it appears received an anonymous letter giving details of the plan of operations adopted by the insurgents, and stating that their intentions was not only to proclaim the republic, but to assassinate him and the civil governor. After the suppression of the revolt the governor published a second bando, ordering all persons, under the pain of severe punishment, to give up their arms, forbidding any assemblages, and even commanding the inhabitants to keep at home.

England against the Slave Trade.

There is one question, says the London Post, which must have occurred to these advocates of a revived Slave trade, and to which we would invite their serious attention. Have they made sure of the consent of England, in the event of their obtainiug a majority in Congress to repeal the law of 1820? We have perceived no reference to this momentous question in the journals that have yet reached us, and we are not a little surprised at the omission. Can it be supposed for a moment that we should be indifferent to the matter? Let not the men of the South deceive themselves on this point. England will never consent to a revival of the Slave-trade. Her abhorrence of it remains unmitigated and unconquerable; she has pledged herself to its suppression by innumerable treaties; she will not now abandon a policy which has, under the blessings of Providence, had the effect of extinguishing the traffic in every quarter excepting the colonies of Spain. We believe that France is equally earnest in this matter. Let the men of Louisiana and Carolina consider these things. They may rely on it that in their present efforts to revive the Slave-trade the opposition of the Northern States will not prove their only difficulty.

The Sound Dues.

The Voss Gazette publishes a document which the Dutch Government has just submitted to the States-General relative to the Sound Dues. The total amount of compensation which Denmark offers to accept is thirty-five millions of rix dollars, of which 1,408,060 would fall to be paid by Holland. It appears that the Danish Government has furnished the Dutch Goverment with a list of the States which have pronounced in favor of capitalization, but as the latter desires to have more exact particulars as to the Sound dues—so far as they especially regard Holland—it will take time to consider its answer.

MAJOR MACNAMARA.

From the London Correspondent of the Liverpool Albion.

A memento mori has been awakened in the breast of many a metropolitan this week by news from over the water of the death of that glorious old "son of the sea" (the English of the Milesian family name), Nacnamara. Mournfully will the tidings recall the figure, still fine in extreme age, of the gallant Major, in Bellamy's Kitchen of the House of Commons; or sauntering up the Haymarket, ever lingering instinctively to look in at the window of the pistol-maker's, opposite the Opera House; or in Bond street, gloating over the hair-trigger treasures of gun-making Bishop—himself a character much of the Major's spirit—as he still is in the flesh (and there's plenty of it) to this day. Macnamara was the beau ideal of the Irish gentleman of the olden time, that admixture of the courtier, soldier and man of fortune which one never sees now, and which none of the Irish romance writers have ever succeeded in delineating, except Lover, and he but once, in "Treasure Trove." The fustian, swaggering, melodramatic, bog-trotting, blarneying brigands of Lever and Maxwell bear not, and never could have borne, the smallest resemblance to the school of which the Major was the type, and in which quietude and punctilio, far more than fastidiousness and grimacing, were the characteristics. Self-respect and respect for others, the two essentials of the genuine gentleman were stamped upon him; and these joined to a winning cordiality of mien and raciness of utterance, made him an universal favorite, without the favoritism degenerating into the familiarity ventured upon towards others of the same stamp, or rather the same status—Dan Callaghan, for instance, the Member for Cork, of claretty and colloquial celebrity. But Dan was by no means the fellow of the Major in the sense now meant; and it was impossible to see the two men together, as they often were, without being struck by the resemblance they presented to Farren and Dowton, in Bunn's then popular (translated) play of "The Minister and the Mercer," in which the traits of the high-bred patrician, and of the under-bred though highly respectable plebeian, were brought out by the two great performers with a naturalness that was a miracle of art. His independence, and the polish which helped to preserve that independence, by repelling all approach to equality on the part of the "tail," rendered Macnamara anything but a favorite, at least politically, with a Daniel of far more judgment and infinitely greater influence than him of Cork. Notwithstanding the Major being O'Connell's second when D'Esterre was shot, and ready to play the same part when Peel pretended to be athirst for the blood of the Hibernian, but prudently shouted fee-faw-fum so loud (as also when he challenged those very shy fighters, Hume and Dr. Lushington,) that the police settled the matter, the Liberator did not like him. Unlike any of the rest of the "tail," the Major, who was the very type of chivalry in all things, held his seat for his own county Clare —for which he mainly helped to return the great Tribune in '28 —not in virtue of Dan's permission, but in right of his own popularity among the electors, whose idol he was as "one of the rale ould blood," sprung of a race who were ancient before Normans or Saxons or even Danes were known. Besides, he was a genuine Repealer, and showed the sincerity of his fascination with that "splendid phantom" in retiring from public life when the bubble burst. His independence of the Liberator—never paraded, but never disguised—caused him to be regarded with no great affection by their reverences, the political priests, who, however, greatly respected him; and among those who expressed that respect was about the very last man who might be expected to feel, or at least all who may have had the opportunity of observing the circumstance, will remember that much to the wonderment of the Dillon Brownes, Fergus O'Connors, and the rest of the boiling parliamentary potatoes, the Major never passed Sir Robert in the lobby without the latter relaxing into one of his most honeyed smiles, and a gentle inflection of his very kitchen pokerish back-bone; the Major reciprocating the courtesy as blandly as if he had him at twelve paces on Wimbledon Common, with surgeons for two, and a coffin for one ordered at the adjoining public house. Peace be with the gallant old warrior, who was ever ready to give, and to teach how to give, a quietus to others, and that, too, with so much ease and elegance that many a man would have deemed it quite a pleasure to have his brains blown out according to the Macnamara code, and quite a misfortune and degradation to run the risk of violating that etiquette!

RICHARD COBDEN ON THE MARITIME LAW.

The following letter to the President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce was read at the meeting of the Directors, from Mr. Cobden, M. P.:

GLYN GARTH, near Bangor, Nov. 8.

"MY DEAR SIR:—Will you allow me to call your attention to a pending diplomatic negotiation in which our commercial and manufacturing interests are deeply involved? You will have observed a declaration made by the late Paris Congress against privateering. That resolution was afterwards submitted for the approval of the American Government, whose answer has not, I think, attracted all the attention it deserves from our mercantile community.

In substance, Mr. Marcy, the United States Foreign Secretary says:

"We do not maintain, like the great European Powers, large warlike establishments in time of peace, and therefore we should, in case of hostilities, rely on the public spirit and patriotism of our private citizens, who would, with the sanction of Government, convert our merchant ships into vessels of war. To deny to this improvised navy the right of making prizes of your mercantile shipping, while to the thousands of vessels constituting your royal and imperial navies this privilege is to be reserved, would be voluntarily to surrender our commerce to annihilation. On no conditions whatever will the American Government renounce the use of its mercantile marine in case of war; and the same power to burn, capture, or sink enemy's property which you give to your Imperial and Royal navies we shall give to our naval volunteers, whether they be called privateers or by any other name. But being anxious to promote the object aimed at by the Congress, we invite you to carry out your principle by going one step further—exempt private property on the ocean from seizure by Government-armed cruisers, as well as by privateers, and the United States will readily meet you on that broad ground."

Now, really, there is no logical way of meeting this proposition but by an instant acquiescence; and, had it not been misrepresented and dealt with in a flippant spirit by some of our journals, it must have received as unanimous an assent in this country as it has from all parties in the United States.

But, with this declaration against privateering at the Paris Congress two other resolutions were coupled, and, had their full scope been understood by our plenipotentiaries, it would have led them to propose to add to M. Walewski's protocol the very clause which has now been suggested by Mr. Marcy.

The Congress declared:

That the neutral flag covers an enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.

That neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under an enemy's flag.

These resolutions reverse the most venerated judgments of our Admiralty Courts, and, for the first time, impart the force of maritime law to principles which were resisted by England against the world in arms down to the close of the war in 1815. Without dwelling on the imperious necessity which led us during the late Russian war to abandon our ancient belligerent rights, let us look at the altered position in which we should be placed in case of a future rupture with a maritime power.

We will suppose—and it is a great stretch of the imagination, after all that diplomacy has achieved during the last three years —that we are at war with France. I remember hearing the late Mr. Samuel Gurney state, in the presence of the Prime Minister of the time, as the results of careful inquiry, that the amount of British property in ships and cargoes afloat, averaged from £70,000,000 to £80,000,000 sterling. It would be a liberal estimate to put down the amount owned by France at from £30,000,000 to £40,000,000. We should thus have twice as much private property exposed to the depradations of Government cruisers as our enemy. But under the new maritime code, which admits the competition of neutrals, it may fairly be questioned whether a merchant ship under either of the belligerent flags would long continue to find it profitable to keep the sea. Railroads, which transmit the heaviest commodities 500 miles with little detriment to their exchangeable value, have virtually put an end to blockades. France, in case of war, could use the ports of Belgium, Holland, or Germany, through which channels her commerce, even with England, might be carried on in neutrals; for, once on board an American or Dutch ship, French exports or imports would be safe from molestation. The same applies to British commodities, whether imported raw materials or exported manufactures; they would be liable to seizure only when on board a British vessel. Now, I ask, would it be possible for French and English ships and cargoes, which would be subject to a charge of 10 or 20 per cent. for assurance against risk of capture, to compete with the neutral flags which would be free from any such burden? And bear in mind that our loss would be three-fold that of our enemy, owing to the larger amount of our tonnage exposed to this unequal competition.

Or, let us suppose ourselves at war with the United States. It may be estimated that the value of American property afloat on salt water (a large part of their navigation is upon the interior lakes and rivers) does not exceed the half of our ours. Unless their late proposal were previously adopted, the old system privateering would be in force on both sides, to which we should offer two-thirds of the prey to their one-third. But the rights of neutrals which were proclaimed at the Paris Congress would admit all the European flags to bring and carry to and from England and America the produce of both countries without risk of capture during the war. Again, I would ask—could a vessel bearing the British flag keep the sea under these circumstances, with 500 or 1,000 armed American vessels cruising against our commerce? It is clear that nobody would charter an English vessel, and pay a heavy insurance against capture, when a neutral ship could be had free from any such charge. The practical effect, then, of the alterations made in our maritime law at the Paris Conferences, if we go no further, would be, in case of war with a naval Power, to transfer the carrying trade even of our own ports to neutral bottoms. It is then our interest especially, and beyond all other countries, to go forward in the path to which the Americans have invited us.

I cannot help regretting, as an Englishman, that the proposal did not originate with us. But the next best thing will be to give it a prompt and hearty acceptance, and aid in securing for it, if possible, a world-wide acquiescence. It is impossible to foresee all the consequences of such revolution in the rules of war. It is, I believe, the first time in the annals of the world that the powers of belligerents will be restrained and defined in the interest of individuals by written international law. Who can tell in what other direction the precedent may be followed? Wars will henceforward partake more of the character of duels between Governments than the old contests of nations. Private citizens will cease to be held responsible or liable to injury, unless they become participators in the strife. There will no longer be plunder and prize money to add the stimulus of cupidity to the passions of hatred and revenge; and we shall have one pretence less for constantly increasing the burden of war navies in proportion to the growth of foreign commerce, on the plea of protecting our mercantile marine. These are some of the obvious consequences of this proposed innovation upon the traditions and precedents of the last century. The mercantile world will, I trust, allow its voice to be heard upon the question by Government and Parliament: and it is in the hope that the chamber will throw the weight of its great influence into the scale of humauity and progressive civilization that I have ventured to trouble you with this letter.

I remain,
Very truly yours,
RICHARD COBDEN.

Thos. Bazley, Esq., President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Under the head of "who stole the Queen's dinner?" the Berwick Advertiser mentions that great exertion had been made by the fishermen in Berwick to obtain a fine salmon for her Majesty's dinner on the day she returned to Holyrood from Balmoral. One of 20lb. was obtained, and one of the fishers went in with it to the station. He called at a house to invite the owner of it to look at the "beauty," and remained but an instant, but on his return to the door, where he had left the creel, to his sorrow the fish had vanished, and never more was heard of.

An Irish officer, not very conversant with law terms, was lately tried for an alleged assault. As the jury were coming to be sworn, the judge, addressing the major, told him that if there were any among them to whom he had any objection, that was the time to challenge them. "I thank your lordship," said the gallant prisoner, "but with your lordship's permission, I'll defer that ceremony till after my trial, and if they don't acquit me, by the piper of Leinster, I'll challenge every mother's son of them, and have 'em out too."

The Norlandspost on, of Stockholm, says:—"The intelligence which we receive from Lapland, is very deplorable. The severe cold which prevailed in the month of August, destroyed nearly all the crops, which is an irremediable misfortune there, where there are no means of communication. The Laplanders are in great alarm, foreseeing a famine in the winter. The temperature in Lapland presented most extraordinary variations this year, severe cold having prevailed in July and August, whereas September and the beginning of October were as warm as summer.

A short time since about eighty of the farmers in the neighborhood of Tamlaght, county Derry, assembled on the farm of Wm. Magill, Esq., Innisrush House, to pay him a mark of respect, for the able and considerate manner in which he has managed the estate, on which they are tenants. They raised several acres of his potatoes, and thus materially advanced his farming operations. The whole party were entertained by Mr. Magill in sumptuous style, and parted at a late hour.

About sixty years ago, when cotton was worth from 1s. to 2s. per lb., about 130 bales were imported into Liverpool from America. Owing to some dispute between the importer and the ware-house owner, the cotton was "thrown into Chancery," and there it has remained until a few days since, when it was sold by order of the court, realising 4 1-3d. per lb.

In Mr. Ernest Jones's "Evenings with the People," he says: "At this moment the Duke of Argyle is prosecuting in the law courts one of his tenants for turning a vast extent of heath into corn-land, removing the barren heather, and growing corn."

"Did you present your account to the defendant?" inquired a lawyer of his clerk. "I did, sir, "What did he say, sir?" "He told me to go to the devil, sir," "Well, and what did you do after that?" "Why, then I came to you."

The Presidential Election.

From the Washington Union.

Having heard from California, we have now returns of the late presidential election from every state in the Union. The result is as follows:

FOR BUCHANAN.

Pennsylvania	27	Delaware	3
New Jersey	7	Mississippi	7
Indiana	13	Louisiana	6
Illinois	11	Texas	4
Virginia	15	Arkansas	4
North Carolina	10	Kentucky	12
South Carolina	8	Tennessee	12
Georgia	10	California	4
Alabama	9	Missouri	9
Florida	3
			174

FOR FREMONT.

Maine	8	New York	35
New Hampshire	5	Ohio	23
Vermont	5	Michigan	6
Massachusetts	13	Wisconsin	5
Connecticut	6	Iowa	4
Rhode Island	4
			114

FOR FILLMORE.

Maryland	8

RECAPITULATION.

Buchanan	174
Fremont	114
Fillmore	8

Buchanan's majority over Fremont, sixty electoral votes; over Fremont and Fillmore, fifty-two electoral votes. We have not received as yet the official returns from all the States; but from official, reported, and estimated returns, we make up the following comparative table of the aggregate vote of all the States:

	1852		1856
Pierce	1,585,545	Buchanan	1,736,000
Scott	1,383,573	Fremont	1,238,083
Hale	157,296	Fillmore	799,472
	3,126,414		3,767,555

The returns yet to come in will increase the aggregate vote at the late election to about three million eight hundred thousand, and Mr. Buchanan's majority over Mr. Fremont to about five hundred thousand votes, thus leaving the black-republican candidate in a minority of about one million three hundred thousand votes. It will be seen from the above table, that while the Democratic vote has been largely increased since the last presidential election, Mr. Fremont's vote falls off about one hundred thousand, as compared with the vote given for General Scott.

There are in this State (says the New Hampshire Patriot) many clergymen who are, and always have been, Democrats; and we can say of them, as the Providence Post says of similar men in Rhode Island, that "we have yet to learn that one of these men preached a political sermon or made a political speech during the presidential campaign. They were not invited to do so, for Democrats do not believe in carrying politics into the church, or in carrying their ministers into political strife. How much influence these clergymen, in view of their sacred office and their relation to their churches, might have exerted for the democratic cause, we do not know and do not care to know. It is pleasant for us, and for them, undoubtedly, to know that their robes are unsullied, and that they have passed through the fiery ordeal unscathed. Believing that a man may vote for Mr. Buchanan, or Mr. Fillmore, or Mr. Fremont, and yet be a good Christian, we are glad nothing has been done by these pastors to cool the religious ardor or wound the feelings of the conscientious supporters of either of these men; and we can most sincerely and earnestly say, so let it be forever."

There is, says the Dayton (Ohio) Gazette, a person at the Swaynie House named Charles Rothschilds, who is a close relation to the distinguished European bankers. He is a sharp, goaheaditive fellow, and is the mainstay of that valuable hotel. He remembers Baron Rothschilds distinctly, and expatiates upon the old gentleman's eccentricities with avidity. He is well educated, speaks Spanish, Italian and French with fluency, and descants upon banks and banking with the utmost freedom. His features are of the Grecian cast; a bright, intelligent blue eye sparkles above a prominent nose, and his broken English escapes through his lips indicating the greatest firmness. Having read much of the United States, he resolved to journey through it, and providing himself with everything needful, set forth greatly to the mortification of his relations, who refused him the slightest assistance. He figures as porter at the Swaynie, and backs his extraordinary independence by a very enviable supply of gold. He wears the air of a prince, and performs only such labor as he deems compatible with royalty. He has shown us his "monthly mail," which corroborates the facts we have stated. He may be seen at the Swaynie House at any time.

The following are the gentlemen selected by the General Assembly of Arkansas to fill the various state offices: T. B. Hanly, Supreme Judge; D. B. Greer, Secretary of State; Wm. R. Miller, Auditor of Public Accounts; John H. Crease, State Treasurer; J. W. Conaughey, Land Attorney, and State Collector. These gentlemen (says the Little Rock Democrat) are all democrats, and were the nominees of a caucus of the democratic members of the General Assembly.

The Rochester Union states that a property, by some believed to be of the amount of $140,000,000, is now held by the law officers of England, in charge for the descendants of a Lawrence, who died without known heirs. Mr. W. F. Lawrence, of Rochester, has investigated the matter, and intends to visit Europe in the Spring, with a fair chance of success. It is stated also, that G. F. Lawrence, pianist and organist, is one of the heirs of this immense estate.

There is probably more smoking done in New Orleans than in any other city in the United States, perhaps in the world, in proportion to the population. Cigar stores are in nearly every block of houses in the city. Nearly every man you meet in the streets has a cigar in his mouth.

About two hundred men, mostly from Tennessee and Mississippi, under command of Samuel Benton, Esq., left Memphis on the 26th ult., to join General Walker's army in Nicaragua.

Mr. Joseph Calhoun died in Dooley county, Georgia, on the 11th ult., at the advanced age of 100 years and 10 months. He was a soldier in the continental army, and received a severe wound at the battle of Brandywine.

The Cincinnati Enquirer tells the following story of how a fortune was made by laziness. A few years ago, our hero, who was about the laziest man in the country, became possessed of some property in Chicago. Too indolent to take care of it, he gave directions to have it sold, and did actually dispose of it at various times, but was too lazy to make out the deeds. Meantime the property increased enormously in value, and the delays caused by the man's laziness placed him at the end of a few years in the possession of an estate worth some $200,000.

The steamer Frank Keeling, at New Orleans, from Columbia, Ouachita river, reports to the Delta that heavy rains commenced falling on Sunday, the 23d, and continued several days. The Ouachita had risen about twenty feet at Harrisonburg, and was still rising. About 120 bales of cotton, which had been lightered over the shoals and signed for by the Frank Keeling, were lost by the sudden rise in the river.

The statement that orders had been issued by the Spanish government that American gold coin should be received at the Havana Custom-house at par, is denied. American gold is only taken at the Custom-house at 10 per cent. discount, and in the trade, of course, at the same rate, although in some instances a greater discount is demanded.

Thirteen banks, with a capital stock of $385,000, huve been established in Wisconsin since the first of July last ; and eight more banks, with a capital stock of $400,000, are now organizing. The old banks have increased their issues during the same period some four or five hundred thousand dollars.

In the South Carolina Legislature, resolutions have been introduced, deprecating the continued agitation of the abstract theories relaring to the slave-trade and other matters, as dividing and distracting the State, and alienating from her the support and sympathy of other States.

The Lexington (Western Missouri) Citizen says that sleighs have been running freely in that town, and that the boys have fine skating on the ponds. So cold a spell for November has scarcely ever been known.

The remains of the late Lieut. Madison Rush, U. S. N., who was drowned in Minnesota, have been recovered and buried in Philadelphia by the side of those of the wife, to whom he had been married but a few months. Lieut. R. was the third son of Hon. Richard Rush.

Vigorous measures are being adopted to construct a railroad between St. Anthony and St. Paul. $75,000 of stock had been taken, and $125,000 more pledged. It was thought that the work of grading would begin early in spring.

The Boston Times says that a census of the town of Chelsea is now being taken, with the view of applying to the next legis lature for a city charter. In 1855, Chelsea contained a population of 10,151.

It is stated that, by a late arrival of two vessels from Leghorn, all the passengers who came, fifty-nine in number, were organ-grinders.

The land sales by the Illinois Central Railroad Company for the month of November amounted to $859,290 47—making the aggregate of sales up to the 1st of December $10,032,977 94.

The Madison (Wis.) Argus of the 2nd inst. says, a terrible storm is raging without, to-day. Snow is falling in large quantities.

A correspondent of the St. Paul Times says that there is a band of organized burglars and highwaymen in that vicinity, who intend to commence operations as soon as navigation fairly closes.

THE DESTINY OF MISSOURI.

From the St. Louis (Missouri) Democrat.

There are few States in the Union that require as much money to do their legitimate business as Missouri. There is no city that requires as much, in proportion to its population, if we except New-Orleans, as St. Louis. The navigation, the trade, the manufactures concentrated here, are immense ; and every day adds to their importance. The products of the South that come up the river, such as salt, sugar, molasses and coffee, amount to millions. Those of the North that descend it—wheat, flour, corn, oats, hogs, pork, cattle, beef, horses, sheep, mules, hemp, tobacco, to say nothing of the smaller articles, such as apples, potatoes, beans, onions, &c.,—require in their purchase an amount of money almost incredible. The cash to buy all these productions must be concentrated here, and every business man knows, that if it could be had in such amount as the immensity of the above productions demand, the prices that the producers and the farmers would obtain for their horses, mules, hemp, tobacco, hogs, cattle, &c., would be largely more than they now receive. The fact is, the cash is not here, and a large per centage that should go to the producer is abstracted from his earnings, because of the little competition in the market. Missouri must review and re-establish her whole monetary and banking system. She must not overlook the importance of her position in the great confederacy. Slowly but surely she will find concentrated in her great emporium, all the vital elements that give command to empire. Geographically her position is central. Her navigation advantages are happily as excellent as her position is fortunate. Here, too, is the center of the greatest agricultural country in the world. At this point will also meet the great mineral staples of America, and with them will appear the mighty seat of their manufacture. Whoever examines these things will see that with such a centripetal combination of forces, the great medium of exchange, money, cannot fly off in an opposite direction. The great focus of business is naturally at the center. If, then, the center of business has got to be on the outside, it is in a wrong position, and when these United States cease to be a debtor nation, New-York will cease to be the center of the money and the business transactions of the continent. In view of this grand destiny to which our State is bound, may we not expect, yea, demand of our representatives, that they anticipate it by an enlightened legislation? A Missouri Bank, with twenty millions of capital, with suitable branches at proper points within, and, if possible, without the State, would be attended with advantages great and lasting. It would make our city the seat of manufactories, enable our merchants to pay the higest prices for all the products, not only of Missouri, but of Iowa, Illinois, Kansas, Nebraska, Louisiana, Tennessee, Mississippi and Arkansas, and place our State in her true position in the great confederacy.

Irish News.

A fatal accident occurred on the Waterford and Kilkenny Railway, on the 21st ult., by which seven persons were killed and a number wounded. A collision between the down mail train and some ballast wagons took place at Dunkit, a few miles from Waterford. It appears that a number of men who were employed ballasting the line above the scene of the calamity, were standing in lurrys, with an engine attached, waiting on the side rail the arrival of the mail train from Dublin to proceed to their work ; but on the approach of the latter—which consisted of the engine and tender, followed by two goods wagons, two passenger carriages, first and second class, and three goods trains bringing up the rear—the engine driver observed the points were not regulated to let his train on the main line, and seeing a collision inevitable, he shouted with all his might to the men on the stationary train to jump off, which he did himself, and the collision immediately took place. The working men in the stationary train jumped from the lurry, and a high embankment being at the side they rushed to, all tumbled back again, and were caught by the train and cut to atoms. Four had their heads cut completely off, and one, who was the only victim who showed any signs of life after the collision, had his arms cut off. Brains, blood, and entrails, pieces of carriages, and engines, goods and luggage were everywhere visible, and all presented a scene too horrible to contemplate. The engine driver, who fortunately leaped on the side of the track where the down train should have passed, escaped almost unhurt. The engine of the down train, with the tender and goods wagon, were smashed to atoms, the tender standing on end. The following are the names of the men who were killed. John Kennedy, Patrick Murphy, John Hudson, James Myers, and Martin Doyle. All those killed were loborers, who had come from Thomastown, and were employed in ballasting the line. The wounded persons were: M. M'Emery, laborer ; J. Hunter, engine driver ; John Snow, fireman ; and Dr. White, Inspector of Lunatic Asylums, all of whom, as soon as assistance was procured, were removed to an adjoining public house, and properly attended to. Dr. White was removed insensible. It is deserving of remark here, that only for the indisposition of Sim Reeves, that gentleman, with the troupe of artists announced to appear in the Town Hall, Waterford, would probably have been in the train. Later accounts state that Dr. White was not so seriously injured as at first supposed.

On the 16th ult., an attempt was made to rob the Bank of Ireland in Carlow. About one or two o'clock at night, several persons got into the rear of the premises in question without being perceived, although they had to pass several wicked dogs, and having cut a pain of glass out of the window of the back door, they endeavored by means of a chisel or lever to force the lock of an iron gate which protected the back of the house. After several strenuous efforts they had to give up the task in despair. According to the regulations of the bank, a porter slept in the office, provided with arms, but being wrapt in the arms of Morpheus, he did not hear the noise. The ruffians then proceeded by means of a ladder, to try their luck on Mr. Stoyte's premises, which adjoins the bank, but in this they were likewise unsuccessful. They tore the wire-work which was on the outside of one of the windows, and cutting a pain of glass out with a diamond, one of them put in his hand and finding that a quantity of delf was laid beneath, fearing that their entrance would cause a crash, they abandoned the place and moved on to the next house, Mr. William Whitmore's where they were more successful. They effected an entrance and proceeded to break open doors, desks, drawers, &c., in various apartments. Having secured a number of silver spoons, knives and forks, and other valuables, they lighted on a mahogany box, belonging to the Friendly Brothers, which they conveyed to the yard, and broke open with some blunt instrument. It contained a gold snuff-box, value £50, a valuable silver corkscrew, case of pistols, and some papers ; but in their hurry, the first two articles escaped the notice of the thieves, and were found in the box.

An English Company has obtained a grant from the College of Dublin to go through their property and open up its internal resources as to ores of different descriptions. This they have succeeded in doing in the parish of Derrynoose, near Keady, County Armagh. Having commenced in January of this year, they have prosecuted the work of raising lead ore very successfully, and their operations are every day increasing ; so much so, that at first they had but three men, while now they have twenty employed, and last month paid in wages above £80. The company succeeded in obtaining the services of an agent or manager from Cornwall, named Captain Tucker, who is not only a practical miner, but also a chemist and surveyor of minerals. This manager has forwarded to Mr. Nunn, of Dublin, a box of lead ore of the best quality, to be placed in the museum of the College as a sample of the minerals their property contains. As the College possess thirty-two townlands, it is fully expected that each of these will produce minerals and coals, which this company will, in due time, turn to good account.

On the 15th ult., a shocking accident occurred in the mill of Dr. Barry, Kanturk. The water-wheel came to a stand without any apparent cause, and after a delay of nearly two hours, during which the miller was ineffectually endeavoring to put the wheel in motion, a part of it was removed, when it was found that a boy in the employment of Dr. Barry had fallen into the water-wheel, and had been torn to pieces between the buckets of the wheel and breastark, the head alone remaining entire.

A loving couple, Miss R——, from the neighborhood of Bruff, whose father could give her a fortune of £700, though she has not yet attained her fifteenth year, and Mr. M——, the son of a farmer in the same locality, took it on themselves to walk off together. The services of Constable Nash were called into requisition, who soon discovered their local habitation, and brought them back to Bruff, there to be united for better or for worse.

The Commissioners of Education, on the recommendation of their Inspectors, F. F. O'Carroll and A. Simpson, have awarded to Mr. Michael Mart, teacher of the Jonesborough Male National School, premiums for the years '54 and '55, for the order, neatness and discipline observable in his school on the occasions of their visits during these years.

The Clonakilty magistrates have refused to grant informations against the constabulary who were charged with stabbing some of the people during the late municipal riots in that town.

A Young Mens' Religious Society has been organized in Dungarvan.

Arrangements have been made by the merchants of Carrick-on-Suir to have that town lighted with gas.

A fire took place on Tuesday morning, in the Richmond Bridewell, situate near Harold's Cross, on the South Circular Road. The fire was discovered in the chapel about two o'clock by Deputy-Governor Delany, who had left his apartments on his way to the gate. He immediately gave the alarm ; the engine belonging to the prison was got out, and all the prisoners whose cells were endangered by the fire were released from their perilous position. The engine was worked by these convicts, who displayed great courage. One man, named Hughes, particularly distinguished himself. In little more than half an hour the Police and Corporation engines arrived. A guard of artillery was present to prevent the escape of any of the prisoners. Mr. Delany, while exerting himself and encouraging the prisoners who were working the engines, was severely hurt by a nail entering his foot. Under the chapel is the bakehouse of the establishment, and it is supposed that the fire was caused by the flues becoming over-heated. The amount of damage done cannot be less than $1,000.

On Saturday, 8th ult., a farmer named John Sanley left his house at Ballyglasson, in the county of Longford, to proceed to the town of Longford, about ten miles distant, for the purpose of paying rent, and purchasing some pigs. He had a sum of money in his possession, the amount of which is not known beyond that it was several pounds. As he did not pay the rent, nor return to his house as usual, his family were very much alarmed, and although a continuous search was made for him for a week, nothing was discovered of him till Saturday, the 15th ult., when he was found dead in a bog hole, in the townland of Curry, about two miles from his own house with his hands and feet strongly bound with a hay rope, all tied together. The persons who took him out of the water removed the tyings, before the coroner and jury had the opportunity of examining them ; but from their subsequent description it is supposed that it could scarcely have been done by himself. No money was on his person when found, which also adds to the suspicion of the case.

On the evening of the 18th ult., when it was quite dark, Constable Burke, and a party of the constabulary from the Ballymacarrett station found a middle-aged man lying upon the Newtownards line, about a mile from Belfast. His right cheek was nearly taken off, and the bone left quite bare ; and he appeared to have received very dangerous, if not fatal injuries in the head. There can be no doubt that the man, who was very much intoxicated, wandered upon the line in the darkness, and received the injuries by the train passing over him. He was conveyed to the General Hospital, where every attention was paid to him, but the hopes entertained of his recovery are very slight. On his person was found some money and a watch, on a paper in which was, " W. H. Allen, Donegore," and this is the only trace of his supposed identity.

It appears that a contest is likely to arise for the two vacancies occasioned among the Irish Representative Peers by the deaths of Viscount Hawarden and the Earl of Bandon ; besides Viscount De Vesci and Viscount Mountmorres, the Earl of Belmore has declared himself a candidate, and rather a close contest may be expected between the last two candidates. The latter nobleman has only recently attained his majority, but is extremely popular ; his uncle and predecessor was a representative peer for many years. Lord Mountmorres is in holy orders, and enjoys an Irish deanery.

Two men named Patrick Bingham and John Sinnott, engaged in blasting stones on the new line of Railway which is being constructed between Bagnalstown and Wexford, whilst at work on that part of the line running through the townland of Ballyellan, county Carlow, between Bagnalstown and Borris having set a blast to a rock without its taking effect at the expected time, proceeded to examine the cause of delay, when unfortunately the explosion took place, killing Bingham instantly, and so injuring the other that the sufferer at least will be rendered blind during his life.

While some of the porters on the Cork and Bandon Railway were engaged in moving a few carriages at the Cork terminus, one porter, named Redmond Barrett, incautiously placed his foot on the rail, when a wheel of the carriage that was then being drawn along passed over it, completely crushing all the small bones in such a manner that on his removal to the South Infirmary amputation was pronounced to be necessary.

The following is the effective strength of the English army at present quartered in Ireland :—

Royal Horse Artillery, 2 Troops ; Royal Artillery Battalion, 8 Companies in Field Battery ; Royal Artillery Battalion, 2 companies in Batteries, forts and towers.

Royal Engineers, Detachments on Survey and Officers.

Cavalry—8 Regiments, viz., 2nd and 3rd Dragoon Guards, 1st Royal Dragoons, 2nd Royal North British Dragoons, 8th Royal Irish Hussars, 16th and 17th Lancers.

Total—6 Depots and Depot Battalions, forming an effective force of 30,300 rank and file of all arms.

On the evening of the 12th ult., as the train which leaves Dublin at 12-40 was approaching Templemore about the hour of 4 o'clock, it met a serious obstruction at a place called Cobbs, by stones placed on the rails of both the up and down tracks. The life preserver of the engine was broken, but no other harm done. The engine-driver reported the circumstance at the next station, and men were sent to remove the stones off the second track before the arrival of the train. It was thought to be the doing of some idle stroller or some young urchins.

The Dublin Freeman has been requested to state that there is no foundation for the rumor that Mr. Handcock, M. P., for Athlone, is about to retire from the representation of the borough. The statement that he had accepted a colonial appointment, and which led to this rumor, is not correct.

A painter named Daniel Cavin, who resided in Queen street, fell into the river, at the head of Arthur's Quay, near Messrs. Harvey's store, Limerick. The tide was out at the time, and he fell on the rough stones, by which his skull sustained a compound fracture, which caused death within an hour, he had been taken to the hospital.

A most ingenious fraud has been perpetrated upon the Belfast Bank by some individual as yet undiscovered. It consisted in changing a bank note of small value into a 50*l* bank note, by inserting the word " fifty" in a note of 1*l* or 5*l* value.

On the 21st ult., a person, named William Read Vaughan, residing at 2 Annesley place, shot an unfortunate female, named Elizabeth Kelso, in an oyster shop in Hawkins' street, Dublin. It appears that the prisoner and Kelso were sitting alone in a room off the shop of the house No. 9 Hawkins' street, which is opposite the stage entrance to the Theatre Royal. The owner of the shop was alarmed by the loud report of a pistol in the adjoining room, and on going in found that the unfortunate woman had been wounded in the cheek by a shot discharged by a pistol fired by the prisoner. The alarm was at once given, and Inspector Lowry proceeded to the scene of the occurrence, and arrested Mr. Vaughan. Elizabeth Kelso was then in a fainting state, and was taken to Mercer's Hospital, where it was ascertained that the wounds inflicted are not of a serious character. When the woman was restored to consciousness, and questioned as to the occurrence, the only statement she made was, that she believed Vaughan did not intend to kill her. The prisoner, on being arrested, did not deny having fired the shot, but attributed it to accident.

A man and woman have been arrested on suspicion of the recent murder of Mr. Little, Cashier of the Midland Great Western Railway. An old hammer and a razor had been found in the Canal, not far from the office, where the murder was committed. This razor on being examined was recognised as being of superior manufacture. The blade, which is of fine steel and well finished, is fitted in a black handle. It appears to have been part of the toilet appointment of some respectable person. The razor was found within a few feet of the spot where the hammer was found, and there appears to be no second opinion as to the fact that it is the weapon with which the assassin completed his work of death, by cutting the throat of his victim, after having first knocked him senseless by the already fatal blows of the hammer.

A daring attempt at robbery was recently made in the house of Colonel Roberts of Waterford. At a late hour some persons effected an entrance into the house, and proceeded with their work of robbery; but in their movements they were heard by the Colonel, who immediately ran for his gun, the robbers got out and and made off down the garden; dropping on their way eight suits of clothing, which they had packed up in a bundle. Colonel Roberts, from his window, saw one trying to get over the garden wall'; failing, however, in his attempt to fasten his feet in the stones. In order not to be caught, he slipped off his boots and got over, and made his escape. The boots thus left behind turned out to belong to the coachman of Alderman Davis, whose house was robbed a few nights before.

Adam Hennessy, aged eighteen years, an apprentice at the Neptune Iron Works, Waterford, fell from the scaffold at the forepart of the new steamer, now being built there, a height of about sixty feet, and when taken up was insensible. Dr. J. P. Mackesy, was called to him, who had the injured man conveyed to the Leper Hospital, where he accompanied and examined him, and found that he had sustained severe injury of the spine, from which he expired about half an hour after his admission.

On the evening of the 15 ult. a woman named Hayer living at Rochestown, a short distance from Passage, left her house, leaving two children at home, one of whom was a boy five years and the other a girl three years old. The woman fastened the door on the outside, and, in a short time after she left, the neighbors discovered that the house was on fire, and, before any assistance could be rendered, the unfortunate children had perished in the flames.

The Derry Standard states that at the Petty Sessions court, a dellicate-looking man, about thirty years of age, named Martin Kelly, presented himself before the Mayor, with a removal warrant from Hartlepool, Durham, from which it appeared he was a laborer for the last eight years. Having lost his health, he applied for relief, and after receiving the same for some time, he, his wife, and three children were sent to Liverpool, and from thence to Derry, to travel or beg their way home to Raskey, county Sligo. The Mayor sent for the relieving officer, who gave an order for their admission to the Union Workhouse.

The Belfast Daily Mercury says there are thirty-two magistrates in that locality, ond only one of them is a Catholic, although of the 130,000 inhabitants in Belfast and Ballymacarett, one-third are Roman Catholics. The one Catholic magistratewas appointed by Lord Normandy. "Government," it says, "are willing to appoint two more," and the names of six Catholic gentlemen of wealth and position have been put forward.

It is a very remarkable that there is not a single northern lawyer on the Irish bench. Chief Justice Lefroy was born in Limerick. Chief Justice Monahan and Mr. Justice Keogh in Galway. Chief Baron Pigot and Mr. Justice Jackson in Cork. Baron Pennefather and Judge Moore in the county Tipperary. Baron Richards, county Wexford. Judges Crampton, Perrin, Ball, and Greene, Dublin.

A very melancholy accident occurred on the 15th ult., on the Bann river, at the new ferry. A woman named Nancy M'Cluney, belonging to Ballymena, was going to pay a visit to some friends in the county Derry, and in going into the boat that plies between the two counties, she missed her foot, and dropped into the river. The young man who had the boat in charge immediately leapt into the stream to rescue her, but she caught hold of him, and they were both drowned.

J. C. Connellan, Esq., Inspector-General of prisons, visited the Queen's Co. Goal for the purpose of making his annual inspection. Having gone through the several sections and classes, and examined the registries and accounts he expressed himself highly pleased with the great order and discipline which distinguished every department.

There are only 33 paupers now in the Belmullet Workhouse, county Clare, which was built for 800, and in which union there was at one time 2,207 persons receiving relief; the cost of the staff for the 33 paupers is £246 per annum, or nearly £8 per head.

At a meeting of the directors of the Ballymena railway company, a dividend was declared of 7 per cent., and a sum of £1,000 was placed to the rest fund. This is one of the largest dividends yet paid by any railway company in Ireland of the same length of line.

The Kilkenny Moderator under the heading of "A Military Mystery," announces that orders have been issued to the Colonels of Militia Regiments in Ireland to complete the quota of their respective corps. The Moderator remarks that the object of this filling up the regiments is known only to the Government.

A writ and summons have been issued against the "The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Belfast," at the suit of Captain William Pirrie, one of the unsecured creditors, for the recovery of £650.

An English company, says the Belfast Mercury, has obtained a grant from the College of Dublin to go through their property and open up its internal resources as to ores of different descriptions. This they have succeeded in doing in the parish of Derrynoose, near Keady, county Armagh. Having commenced in January of this year, they have prosecuted the work of raising lead ore very successfully, and their operations are every day extending, so much so that at first they had but three men—now they have twenty employed, and the last month paid wages above £80. The company succeeded in obtaining the services of an agent or manager from Cornwall, Captain Tucker by name, who is not only a practical miner, but also a chemist and surveyor of minerals. This manager has forwarded to Mr. Nunn, of Dublin, a box of lead ore of the best quality, to be placed in the museum of the college, as a sample of the minerals the property contains. The utmost wish of the owners has been realised in the production for so far, and when the work will be more extended, there is no doubt of its paying a handsome dividend. As the college possesses thirty-two townlands, it is fully expected that every one of those will produce minerals and coals, which this company will, no doubt, in due time, turn to good account.

A correspondent of the Leinster Express, writing from Athy, says a dreadful calamity seems to have seized the potato crop in that neighborhood. Potatoes that appeared perfectly free from disease when lifting, are now becoming damaged in the pits. Several instances have come under his notice, nearly all exhibiting rapid symptoms of decay. The market is largely supplied with the esculent, owing to the great many extensive growers of the crop being determined to sell the surplus quantity before any serious loss is sustained. The average market price is 3½d per stone for the picked ones; but a very large quantity that seemed to be giving way rapidly to the disease, are selling at the unusual low figure of one shilling per barrel.

The Road Sessions for the Barony of Forth, took place on the 17th ult. Present: Charles A. Walker, V.L., Chairman, John H. Talbot, D.L., Laurence Sweetman, Frederick Solly Flood, John Walsh, W. A. Armstrong, and John Greene, Esqrs. Cesspayers—James Howlin, and Thomas H. Rowe, Esqrs. and Mr. Flood brought forward a resolution in favor of the Railway Question, which was passed in the following shape:—"We the Magistrates and Cess-payers assembled at Road Sessions at Wexford, for the Barony of Forth, feeling the necessity of Railway Communication, any project having for its object the general construction of railways, calculated to bring the traffic from the interior of Ireland to the ports of Wexford and Enniscorthy, deserves our support."

The Derry Journal informs us that the staff of the London derry Militia were recently inspected at the Ebrington Barracks, by Colonel Doyle, who, in addition to the usual inspection on parade, examined the men apart, individually questioning each with regard to the length of his services, knowledge of discipline, &c. This inspection is believed to be preliminary to a further disembodiment, by which the more advanced in years will be removed; but whether their places will be fitled up by men fit for active service, is only matter of conjecture.

The emigration, says a Belfast paper, for the present year, considerably exceeds that of last year, both as to the numbers and respectability of the emigrants. During the last year, there were, we understand, 4,119 emigrants from this port, and up to the current month of the present year, there have been nearly 6,000 emigrants.

The strike on the Killarney and Tralee Railway has been amicably arranged, and for the first time the employers have struck to the employed. The men will be paid in future according as they work, at the rate of 1s 6d per day. This is all they required from the first.

Three sheep, the property of William Tunstead, a farmer, residing near Ballickmoyler, were killed by cutting their throats, and the carcases left on the field. A few nights previously, three goats, belonging to a person named Dempsey, who resides at Killeen Chapel, Queen's County, were killed in like manner, and their carcases left on the roadside.

Colonel Knox Gore, commanding officer of the Sligo Rifles, has received an order from government directing him to proceed at once with the enrolment of recruits to the number required to complete the strength of the regiment. Each recruit on being attested will receive the usual bounty.

A brig, the James Gold, of Sunderland, appeared dismasted off the coast of Ross, near Carrigaholt, on the 8th ult. On being boarded by the Coast Guards, she was found laden with timber; and in the course of the ensuing night went to pieces a little further to the east, at a place called Truscliff.

His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, has been pleased to appoint Edmund Burke Roche, Lord Baron Fermoy, to be Lieutenant General and Custos Rotulorum for the county and the city of Cork.

Edward King Tenison, Esq., has resigned the appointment of Lieutenant General and Custos Rotulorum of the county Lectrim, and his Excellency has appointed George Arthur, Earl of Granard, to be Lieutenant General and Custos Rotulorum.

Edward King Tenison, Esq., has been appointed Lieutenant-General and Custos Rotulorum of the county Roscommon. Mr. Tenison represented Leitrim from 1847 to 1852.

W. Muschamp Vesey, Esq., of Saintfield, has been appointed to the commission of the peace for the county Down, on the recommendation of the Marquis of Londonderry, Lieutenant of the county.

The Belfast Town Council's chattel property was recently seized, at the suit of a creditor, Mr. James Reyland, for the sum of £75.

A little girl aged two years, daughter of a man named Clarke, residing in Barrack street, Dundalk, was so seriously burned that her death ensued on the following day.

The following gentlemen have been called to the bar at the sitting of the Chancery court:

John Patrick O'Hara, Esq., A. M., T. C. D., only surviving son of Martin O'Hara, late of Claremorris, in the county of Mayo, merchant, deceased.

James Henry Monahan, A. B., T. C. D., eldest son of the Right Hon. James Henry Monahan, of Fitzwilliam square, in the city of Dublin, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas.

Charles Henry Foote, Esq., A.B., Scholar, T.C.D., eldest son of Lundy Edward Foote, Esq., of Upper Fitzwilliam st., city of Dublin, barrister-at-law.

Randal Wm. M'Donnell, Esq., A.B., T.C.D., fourth son of John M'Donnell, Esq., of Gardiner's row, city of Dublin, Poor Law Commissioner.

The Clare Journal states that orders from the War Office have been received to enrol men for the county Clare.

On the 17th ult. the remains of the late James Pim, treasurer of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway, were consigned to their last resting place in Mount Jerome Cemetery. The funeral was one of the largest that has taken place in this city for many years past, and was attended by nearly all the principal mercantile men in Dublin. But what is now somewhat rare in Dublin, a large concourse of respectable citizens accompanied the funeral on foot, and a body of the operatives employed by the railway companies with which the lamented gentleman was connected also attended to pay this last tribute of respect to the deceased.

Constable Peter Pender, Acting-constable Thomas O'Brien, and Sub-constable Cornelius Fitzgerald, of the Queens county, have resigned for the purpose of emigrating to Australia. These men were all of long service—the lowest being ten years connected with the force; they bore excellent characters; but seeing so little chance of competent provision for old age, they thought it better to try their fortunes in another hemisphere. Constable Pender had served two years at the Crimea in the Mounted Staff Corps, and the Commissariat department.

On the 15th ult. a large and influental meeting of the ratepayers of the barony of Lower Ormonde, in the county Tipperary, was held in Parsonstown for the purpose of adopting measures to oppose the imposition of the proposed guarantee upon the rates of Lower Ormonde, to secure interest at the rate of four per cent. on the money expended in constructing a line of railway from Roscrea to Nenagh.

Small pox, says the Clare Journal, is raging in a fearful state in Killaloe and in the neighboring townlands; several children have died from its effects, and several are now lying in a fearful state, young and old. Over 200 have been vaccinated during one week for cowpox, the greater part having had it before. It is considered here that it should be repeated every five years, or else it would not be a preventative against natural pox—so say the faculty.

The Dublin Freeman regrets to learn that a sad accident befel the Chief Secretary while hunting, on the 15th ult. with the Ward hounds. It appears that in a hard run of some two hours, Mr. Horsman, who is a first rate rider, was somehow or other thrown from his horse, and while in that state the hores, which was quite tired, rolled over him heavily, and severely injured him.

Michael Quin, Esq., one of the members of the Limerick Corporation, has resolved on withdrawing from the Council. Connected with the Town Council from its first formation under the Municipal Reform Act, he was remarkable for the stern integrity of his public principles, his honest and independent votes, and his manly advocacy of every measure calculated to advance the public interests.

Samuel Stanley, a private in the 60th Rifles, was brought up on remand, charged with having violently assaulted John Davis, by stabbing him in the arm and leg with a bayonet, at the Naas road, on the 2nd ult. A girl named Loftus, who had been walking with Stanley at the time of the occurrence, stated that Davis was the first assailant. The prisoner was sent for trial at the county sessions, but the magistrate said he would admit him to bail.

Henry Rivers, a fashionably-dressed individual, and a woman named Maria Andrews, were, on the 21st ult., brought up to the Head Police office, in custody of Sergeants Mears and Keegan, charged with picking pockets on the Great Southern and Western Railway. They were remanded for examination.

We were surprised, says the Kilkenny Journal, of the 15th ult., to witness a remarkable proof of the clemency of the season, inasmuch as Mr. Bryan, of Jenkinstown, kindly forwarded us, for inspection, peas, raspberries, strawberries, and white currants, now growing in his garden.

Mr. John Potter A. B., T.C.D., eldest son of Alderman Potter, J. P., of Kilkenny, has been admitted a member of the Dublin Royal College of Surgeons, after a severe examination of ten days.

An old woman, named Alice Hinds, died in the poorhouse of Clonmel, having reached the extraordinary age of one hundred and five years.

Mr. Melville, Chief Accountant in the Provincial Bank, Waterford, has been appointed Manager of the new branch about to be opened in Carrick-on-Suir.

Sir C. Coote, M. P., has signified his intention of subscribing £10 annually to the Royal Agricultural Improvement Society of Ireland.

His Grace, the Archbishop of Tuam, recently administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to a large number of children in Galway.

The Dublin and Kingstown Company have presented £2,500 to Mr. Jas. Pim, for his long exertions in the advancement of that company.

The vacant ribbon of the order of St. Patrick has been bestowed on Viscount Gough.

Henry Denny, Esq., has sent in his resignation as Town Councillor for the West Ward in Waterford.

OPINIONS OF THE IRISH PRESS ON MR. BUCHANAN'S ELECTION.

From the Dublin Nation.

Long life to James Buchanan, by the grace of God and the will of the people, President of the United States. We have watched with intense interest this election, and share the feelings which fill almost every Irish heart from Maine to Mexico at the result. To our race it is a signal triumph, for we cannot forget, and he never does, that the new President is of Irish blood. And he enters the White House at a most remarkable emergency in the history of the Union, when it may be possible for him to take as grand a part as that which was played by the last Irish President, Andrew Jackson. What effect his administration may have upon the interior policy of the Union, we can hardly hazard an opinion. We believe it will be to conserve the Union at all hazards and by all means. But for the Irish in the States and outside, this event means the downright discouragement of Know-Nothingism; it means the extension of the Union wherever "manifest Destiny" opens the way for legitimate annexation; it means that England must yield every inch of territory she has unjustly gained, and every pretension of authority she has presumed to put forward in Central America. In four years more, the world, old and new, will be likely to need new maps. On that of the United States, we dare say we shall see Cuba and Nicaragua at all events, perhaps another slice of Mexico, and a few of the West Indies, marked with superabundant stars. The young geographer will in vain search for a vestige of British authority along the melancholy coast of Mosquito, or on the woody hills of Ruatan.

The English nation is naturally rather wroth. Mr. Buchanan has of late been dwelling among them, and has studied their statesmen, their manners and customs, their method of making war and of despatching diplomacy: never was an American statesman since Benjamin Franklin who had such an opportunity of studying them. He knows England as well as Louis Napoleon; and the fact is itself significant that at such a time those two great Western potentates should have had such opportunities of penetrating the character of their neighbor. On the questions at issue between the Governments of Washington and London, Mr. Buchanan has drawn his line as Ambassador, and it is one from which he cannot recede as President. It means the absolute retreat of England from Central America. He has, moreover, declared his opinion that if she does not go, there ought to be armed occupation. President Pierce supported his diplomacy to this point, and from this point President Buchanan undertakes the conduct of the business. So if there ever was danger of war with the States it is now.

In a country where so much is guided and influenced by the fluctuating policy of an unmanageble public opinion, it is difficult to speculate beforehand upon what may be the career of any statesman in authority. But there are several remarkable and characteristic circumstances connected with Mr. Buchanan's accession which distinguish his election from any in the dynasty of Presidents for many past years. He is the first statesman who has reached the position in consideration of eminent public services, since the time of the Founders of the Republic. It was a position hitherto denied to men of that stamp—to Webster, to Calhoun, to Clay, and reserved, owing to the rivalry which great public talents evoked, for some dashing soldier, like Taylor, who had cut through a lucky campaign, or a respectable lawyer, like Pierce, who could wait to be propelled by his party. Buchanan, on the contrary, is an old, experienced, and resolute party leader, thoroughly trusted, and perfectly representing the platform of his party, which never put forth such unbroken strength as in his election. In Congress, he hardly ranked below the three great statesmen we have named, whose names have passed together to immortal fame. He was Secretary, under Mr. Polk, during the Mexican War, which added California to the Union, and administered it with consummate ability. His diplomatic transactions in England would have made an illustrious character for an otherwise unknown man. Never was the honor of the States—of any State—so haughtily upheld, and the truth and dignity of a question of war sustained in a more masterly manner. Recalled from his mission to a yet higher honor, the Central American question is still reserved in petto to be the first glory of his Administration. In three months more, we venture to predict England's equivocation will be finally brought to an end, and her flag have faded from the horizon of San Juan.

But not merely is Mr. Buchanan himself a statesman of talents equal to his eminent position. It is already rumored that it is his intention to surround himself with a ministry of the younger and more energetic politicians of the Union, bold and able enough for any emergency. His principal Secretary will probably be the Senator of Illinois—the ready, adroit, and daring "little giant of the West"—Douglas. It has been expected for some time, we hear, that James Shields will be recalled from his Sabine farm and offered the bureau of Military Affairs by his old friend, the President. The Times already augurs ill for British interests from the men who surround his Excellency.

We cannot but look with hope to an administration of such brilliant promise. Even were Mr. Buchanan not of Irish blood or sympathies, we have an interest in the States commensurate with the fact that millions of our race are dwelling in those dominions—an interest which makes it almost as important a question for us to study the Chief of the Executive at Washington, as the Premier in Downing street. That his rule may be prosperous and courageous, and that in his day more stars may culminate in the firmament of the Union, is the prayer of many an honest heart in James Buchanan's fatherland.

From the Dundalk Democrat.

The greatest news of the week is the triumphant election of James Buchanan, the son of an Irishman—of the old stock—as President of the great American Republic. Honor to the men who supported and advocated his cause, and to those who returned him by their votes, amongst whom the Irish residents of the States stand out conspicuous. The votes were—for Buchanan, 163; for Fremont, 125; and for Fillmore, 8; giving Buchanan a majority of 30. On behalf of the people in this part of Ireland we beg to thank the noble supporters of Buchanan for the victory they have won. They have slapped Know-Nothingism in the face; they have given a blow to England which she feels in her inmost heart; they have boldly, manfully and bravely vindicated the great principles of the American revolutionists, and struck terror into the heart of despotism in every land.

The rascally press of England did its utmost by lies and slander to blacken the character of Buchanan before the American people, but it has utterly failed in its vile object. The Democrats in America are not going to be guided by the vile English press. Its censure they accept as praise, and its praise they receive as censure. Accordingly they have rallied round Buchanan, and borne him triumphantly to victory. The Times laments it deeply; but not being able to undo what has been done by honest men, it makes a virtue of necessity, and says "it will never allow any objections entertained to Mr. Buchanan's principles to prevent it from treating with respect and candor the acts of the chief magistrate of a great and kindred people."

There is no comfort found for the Great Briton in any quarter. All people repel his insolence, denounce his pride, and repudiate his friendship. And he may be assured, that should he exhibit any more of his domineering spirit in the West, James Buchanan will pay him home with interest.

From the Dublin Tablet.

The news of the election of Mr. Buchanan as President of the United States is an event which has been long foretold in the Tablet, and, since the casting of the Pennsylvania vote, has been generally expected. To us, as Catholics and Englishmen, it wears a double aspect. As the defeat of the northern bigots, the Know-Nothing fanatics, the savage persecutors of the Irish immigrants, the despicable, insolent, prying inquisitionists who intrude their vulgar curiosity into our convents, the hypocritical philanthropists who clamor against slavery while they can scarcely prevail upon themselves to allow a man of color to share in air and water, we rejoice in it sincerely. As the victory of fillibustering annexionists, of upholders and extenders of slavery, of men whose arguments are bowie knives, and whose persuaders are revolvers, we deplore it as sincerely. But neither of these views embraces the true bearings of the question. The great American people are neither Know-Nothings nor Fillibusters. They have decided for themselves, according to their right, who shall be their President. They are the best judges of their own affairs under the circumstances in which they were called upon to act. The common sense, the evident interests of a great and free people, will control the action of President Buchanan, as they would have controlled the action of President Fremont. Had the Know-Nothing party gained the ascendancy it is certain that the Catholic and the Irishman would have suffered. The Democratic party has retained its hold of place, and we may safely trust their enlightened views of their own interests to avoid forcing on a collision with the strength of England,

WHAT IS CALLED THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

From the Irish American.

The leader, in "The Metropolitan," (a Catholic monthly magazine, published in Baltimore, by Murphy & Co.) is from the pen of Archbishop Hughes. It has caused no inconsiderable interest in the American Catholic world. It will be found in full in this paper this week. Very few of our readers will pass it without perusal.

To them we leave the consideration of its main features, and come to that passage which immediately concerns The Irish American. We regret the Archbishop has deemed it necessary to introduce the name of our humble sheet, inasmuch as we never assumed nor aspired to the position of a religious journal. We give from week to week "News from Ireland," and such communications, letters, sermons and lectures as we, in our judgment consider fit. In no vain boast do we say that, without seeking what is called patronage, from any quarter, we have worked perseveringly and industriously to produce an Irish American newspaper, which has secured a circulation larger by far, than any of its class which has preceded or competed with it. It is to us a matter of just pride to declare that, in a business point of view, those who have purchased it and advertised in its columns, are prompt, correct and generous in their dealings. This circulation and these results we refer to with a view to contend that no journal can attain either influence or pecuniary independence if it have not professional qualities essential to success. We mean well selected reading-matter, interesting items of news, editorial opinion appropriate and forcible, valuable contributions, whether literary, scientific or political, industry and thrift in the management. Without such requirements, no patronage or expenditure can avail. With them, the chances of a successful newspaper enterprise are favorable.

We have neither pretended nor assumed to publish this as a Roman Catholic journal. We stated plainly and fully our plans and intention in our prospectus. From the terms of that document, we have not deviated. We never appealed for support to religious prejudices or passions. We ever believed that "so-called Catholic editors," had done and were doing more harm than good to the cause they affected to espouse. In this we are pleased to find we are endorsed by the able pen of the Archbishop. We plead guilty to the charge of uniting with a Protestant partner in the publication of an Irish-American periodical, devoted to our fellow-countrymen of all creeds and denominations; devoted to the land that bore us; devoted to rational liberty as it is understood in its noblest sense; devoted to the interests of our kindred on this broad continent; devoted to the purity, preservation and perpetuation of Democratic Republicanism; devoted to this great and glorious commonwealth, to the Constitution which watches over and protects all, and to the indissoluble union of its confederate States.

In the ultimate independence of Ireland, we firmly believe. This, we as firmly believe, can never be attained without a fraternity of Irishmen of all creeds, who, adhering firmly to their several religious convictions and confining them to their sacred and proper spheres, will come together and contend for the rights of a common country and a common nationality. We are convinced, too, that irritating language, intolerant harangues, bitter recriminations and vulgar abuse, (such as all enlightened and honest men must condemn,) do incalculable injury and create estrangements and divisions inimical to our objects.

If these views and desires, but imperfectly propounded by us, be "plausibilities," we must plead guilty of having recourse to them. We fear, too, that on this head, we are impenetrable; and that our course of "conciliation" must continue.

So much for the "Reflections," as far as they concern this paper. We suppose the right of explanation will be conceded to us. At all events we claim it. "Now the truth is best in all matters of this kind," in the language of the Most Reverend writer—so we point especial attention to his important suggestions.

We are afraid the Archbishop has not honored this paper with a steady perusal. If he had, we should have naturally expected some allusion to the very many articles we have written on the subject of keeping "religion and politics asunder;" to the numerous occasions on which we contended that there should be "no connexion between church and state." For several years we have had almost every "so-called Catholic" publication in the United States opposed to us in a controversy on this point. Of this our weekly readers are aware. We invariably quoted and replied to attacks of our opponents. They never inserted our defence except in garbled extracts. We, over and over again, advanced the opinion that the learned and pious ecclesiastics of the Church were its legitimate and ablest defenders, and that it and they required no aid from the pens of, oftentimes, ignorant and intemperate advocates. That such rash and uninformed persons, by their unsound and unrepublican theories, by their wild and impassioned appeals (by which such as he of the Boston Pilot and he of the Shepherd of the Valley had desecrated the name of religion) had been guilty of many criminal follies—had whetted the appetite, if not evoked the brutal passions of Know-Nothing mobs, and been the proximate cause of their ferocious consequences—we frequently and indignantly charged upon them. The poor Irish (that name being synonymous with Catholic,) were principally the victims, and had to suffer for the insanities of paper-pellet marksmen, ensconced behind the safe bulwarks of their editorial desks. When the fires of persecution, which they had contributed to kindle, had done their worst, these writers became alarmed. They altered their courses, and refrained (when it was too late) from urging their un-American political theories. Truth, we knew, was powerful, and, in the end, would prevail. It is to us a source of pardonable pride to find that the advice and suggestions of an eminent ecclesiastic repeat, with much eloquence and power, what we so feebly but so frequently put forward and called attention to.

The Archbishop has been pleased to give a specimen of our "plausibility" in the shape of a note addressed to some "bigot newspaper lampooner of the Catholics;" he pointedly remarks that "the whole busines becomes a double advertisement;"—and that in reply we are complimented by the enemy as being "a very sensible man, entirely disabused of the errors of our religion, emancipated from the superstitions of our creed, and the control of our clergy."

Touching the "double advertisement," we are bound to declare that such a compliment (which we have always looked upon and treated as an insult) coming from "a vile newspaper," is in a business view calculated to injure rather than to serve us—that is if such were likely to meet the eyes of our friends. The article under consideration is more calculated, we say with every respect, to bring us material aid in the shape of notoriety than any other production of the pen that we can now bear in mind.

If we believed our religion to be in error, or that it was a superstition, we should not belong to it; nor do we think that any one who professes it is more ready to acknowledge in his own person, or recommend to others to obey, the proper, legitimate and becoming "control of his clergy" than ourself.

It is quite true that our partner and we never discuss disputed points of creed. It is quite true that we never quarrel about matters of faith. We have been ever inclined to believe that those who so disputed and so quarreled had more religion on their lips than in their hearts.

These are matters we should prefer not making allusion to, but the facetious introduction into the article of the "amount of religion between us (our partner and ourself) to quarrel about," and the burlesque imitation of the style of our epistolary correspondence, leave us no other alternative.

We conclude by repeating that this journal never was and never pretended to be "an organ of the Church"—that it never professed to be, never was in reality, is not, and does not intend to be a member of "what is called the Catholic press"—that it is devoted especially to the moral, social and political interests of Irish Americans—that it is engaged in the defence and support of the Irish race at home and abroad—that it is wedded to and shall make every effort it can to sustain the principles of Americanism, of Democratic Republicanism, and to perpetuate the integrity and solidity of this powerful and noble confederation of States—that in carrying these intentions into practical effect it solicits no patronage and begs no adventitious support. All it demands is a clear stage and no favor.

KING ARTHUR AND THE KNIGHT OF THE ROUND TABLE.

From a Correspondent of the Dublin Telegraph.

The exploits of King Arthur have been borne on the zephyr of fame for a period of one thousand three hundred and fifty-four years; they were numerous and spread into and gilded the tales of most of the nations of Europe. When we consider his giant mind and stature, his position, and the age he lived in, we may be enabled to select from the bundle of romance, the feats worthy a man so great. His deeds of terror were written by Chaucer, Lidgate, Spenser, Warton, Drayton, Dryden, &c., by Geoffrey of Monmouth and Camden. This "good King," was son of Uthyr Pendragon, one of the princes of Britain; he was born A. D. 502, at Tintagal, in Cornwall, a principality then inhabited by the ancient Britains (or Welch), over whom his father ruled. From his infancy, like the Irish princes, he was trained to arms; and at the age of fifteen he was crowned with great pomp at Caerllean, on the river Usk, in South Wales, in the presence of four British Kings, each bearing a golden sword, while their queens in like manner carried four white doves. Immediately after the coronation, Arthur led his Britains against the Saxon army, which fell or fled before the well-guided arrows and prowess of his soldiers; and this was but the first of a long succession of victories won from the same people, the principal one of which was gained at Caer Badon, (Badon Hill, near Bath) in Somersetshire, where he was opposed by the renowned Saxon general, Cardic. The fame of his victories collected around him all the gallant knights of his nation; and these were so jealous of his favor, that each strove to be near his person. To prevent any bad consequences arising from the jealousies of his warriors, the king placed a "round table" in his council chamber, and commanded that each knight should take his seat by chance as he entered—without order or ceremony. And thus union and friendship were preserved—better than by the rule of the Irish monarchs, which ordered that each noble should take his place, in the Senate and hall, marked by his armorial bearings.

While Arthur created a spirit of emulation in deeds of glory among his companions in war, he did not neglect the advancement of religion, of which he was a zealous promoter, the more beneficial to his country at that time when Christianity had made little progress; and among the pious and the good none was found to ascend so far to heaven as the mighty Arthur—for really he stood eight feet above the level of his sandals! This giant stature fitted him nobly for the station he filled, and encouraged his gallant Britains who followed him to the battle-field, in breaking in many a bloody fight the power of the Saxon, and in chasing to their native hills the troublesome Picts and Celts. Thus did every soldier prove himself "a Briton," while the name and deeds of Arthur were the subject of every tongue.

But ah! how transitory is the glory of time. That gifted child of nature and fortune died the most wretched—the most insulted of mankind! He conducted a body of his world-famed warriors to chastise the Visigoths who had been troublesome to his nephew Howell, prince of Brittany, and after accomplishing this act of valor, he returned to his country—but to find that his brother Medrod, to whom he had committed the government while absent, had robbed him of his kingdom and his queen! A desperate action was the consequence, in which the base and wicked Medrod fell beneath the vengeance of his brother; and Arthur, the beloved parent of his people, sank, in the vigor and bloom of life on the field of Camlan. Lacerated and bleeding, he was borne from the bloody plain to the Abbey of Glastonbury, where in a few days he died of his wounds, and was buried in the abbey. So perished the "good King Arthur," the pride and power of Britain! "Perished!" No, "gentle reader," he but disappeared, while the renown and impress of his actions governed Albion for a thousand years! And this, even while the place had passed from memory "where a Britain had laid him," and remained hidden in the obscurity of time until discovered by Henry II., when reading some Welch manuscripts, 646 years after his death. From the minute description of the place of sepulture given in the Welch poem, Henry was guided to the spot, and on removing several feet of clay, the bones were discovered in the hollow trunk of an oak, which lay extended between two columns of stone, and covered with a ponderous flag. The bones were of a prodigious size, and all in proportion; that of the shin measured five inches more than the similar bone of a man six feet high! The skull was exceedingly large, and had in it the mark of ten wounds. On the under side of the flag which covered the coffin, was a leaden cross, on which was inscribed in rude Roman letters the following epitaph:—

Hic jacet sepultus inclitus Rex Arturius in insula Avalonia.

That part of Somersetshire where stood the great Abbey of Glastonbury, was then called the Island of Avalonia.

I would publish a fac simile of the cross and inscription were it less troublesome to prepare a plate or cut for that purpose; but if "Inquirer" or any other gentleman be deeply imbued in the heart-softening tinge of antiquity, he has only to intrust his secret to the post office, to have his longings relieved by a "true copy."

I shall now close my account of King Arthur, with an old English rhyme, descriptive of the simplicity of the manners and times of that good king:—

When good King Arthur ruled this land,
He was a goodly King;
He bought three pecks of barley-meal
To make a bag-pudding.

A bag-pudding the King did make,
And stuffed it with black plums;
Large lumps of suet he put into it,
As big as my two thumbs.

The King and Queen did eat thereof,
And all the court beside;
And what they could not eat that day,
The Queen next morning fried.

If the above be a fact, and it is so held, risum teneatis, amici,

Holy Cross, is so called and distinguished, as being the site of a Cistercian Monastery, founded in honor of the holy Cross, of which a portion is said to have been preserved there by Donogh Carbragh O'Brien, King of Limerick. The extensive and picturesque ruins of the Abbey consist of the nave, choir and transepts of the church, with a lofty square tower, supported on four pointed arches. There are also several chapels, which, with the tower, are much more elegantly designed and finished than the rest of the structure; their roofs are delicately groined, their nave is separated from the aisles by four arches, and it has a west window of large dimensions. Among the tombs is one with a sculptured cross, without an inscription, which O'Halloran ascribes to the founder, and local tradition to the "good woman" who brought there the piece of the true Cross. On the south side of the choir are the remains of the pointed arches and twisted columns, within whose intricacies the Monks used to be "waked." A luxuriant foliage of ivy, when we were there last, mantled the ruins overhanging the margin of the gentle Suir.

Blackwater.—Quite right. Ned Lysaght—"pleasant Ned Lysaght," as Curran christened him—wrote the Rakes of Mallow. Lysaght was a brave, brilliant, witty, eloquent, devil-may-care Irishman—so, at all events, Daniel Owen Madden says of him. Davis credits him with the only good Volunteer song ever written.

"The Beauty of the Strand."—The following remarks on the subject of Irish poetry or prosody, accompanied the exquisite Irish lay, which has been so exquisitely translated by our friend Michael Doheny:

"The following is a translation of a poem—if such it may be called—now for the first time published in any dress. The translator does not know its author—one or other of the Munster poets of the last or second last century—and he is indebted for the original to John O. Mahony, who learned it from some milk-maid, while milking on the 'Bawn.' It is distinguished by a simplicity as well as sweetness and delicacy, which, would seem to ascribe it to an earlier and more classic era.

The translator has attempted to preserve not only the sense and sentiment of the original, but the construction and sound of the Irish versification. He is not aware that any such attempt has been ever before made, except fitfully and imperfectly, by the late Edward Walsh, and rather by way of indulging a most prolific fancy, than with a view of giving a correct idea of the structure of Irish verse. Indeed, throughout his translation, his fancy seems entirely beyond control, and many of the images are his own. He is, however, incomparably the best Irish translator that has yet appeared—in fact the only one who understood the native tongue. Furlong, Dalton, and Lawson, the translators of the Ballads published by the Archœological Society, appear to be truly ignorant of Irish. Furlong's verse is thoroughly English both in construction and in sentiment. The character of Dalton's translations does not seem to be either English or Irish, and they certainly are not translations. In no one instance does he seize the character or the sentiments of the original, and he somewhere takes credit for supplying the sentiments "which would become the original bard to write." Clarence Mangan's noble rendering of "Dark Rosalind," though he understood not one word of Irish, is far truer to the genius of the original than any translation extant. But, nevertheless, it is not a translation, but a far nobler song than the original.

The intention of this note was to give a brief explanation of Irish prosody, and to illustrate some of its complex requirements by references to the above translation; but it has already grown too long, and the translator, reserving for another occasion a full explanation, will content himself here with a few general remarks.

The construction of original Irish poetry is entirely different from that of any language known to the translator. He shall only refer to one of its requisites or attributes here—there are several. It is called "concord," and consists in having two words in the first line beginning with the same vowels or with consonants of the same class. These words may be in any part of the line, and near and apart. In later times this led to the frequent, perhaps too frequent occurrence of the same vowel sounds in the same line. Irish poetry wanted rhyme except what was known in the Provencal as assonant rhyme, called in Irish correspondence. The rythme was measured by syllables and not by "feet." All poems were divided into "quatrains" or verses of four lines, and each line into seven distinct syllables. Modern poetry, such as this song, while preserving the rules of "concord," "correspondence," and all that can be so named according to English prosody and the same metre, is preserved in the translation. It consists in each line of a "spondee" or two long syllables and three "anæpests," two short and one long syllab'e. This measure is strictly observed throughout in the original; in the translation it is strictly observed in the four first stanzas, and in the others an "anæpest" is substituted for the "spondee."

This subject, only here glanced at, is one of deep literary interest and may hereafter be discussed more at length by the translator.

THE BEAUTY OF THE STRAND.

Translated from the Irish, by Colonel Doheny.

Adown by the tide, does the white-skinned abide,
My light, my delight, of the fairest the pride;
The sweet-scented rose, through the whole year that blows,
I'll toast and I'll boast of in Gaelic that glows.

How many a maid, in rich satins arrayed,
And lawn like the dawn, and choice gold rings inlaid,
My coldness upbraids—but their showiness fades,
Before thee my storeen, the flour of young maids.

Far dearer to me, than sleek kine on the lea,
'Neath mists to be roaming from home love with thee;
Sweet kisses I'd steal, sweetest ecstasy feel,
And wander, still fonder, through world's for your weal.

On Sunday when praying, my fancy is straying,
My fairest, my rarest, to where thou art staying;
Till passionate pain thrills my heart as my brain,
To bleed all unheeded forever again.

'Tis time I should tell, in what arts you excel,
How you write with pen light so exceedingly well;
How your voice on the breeze, coaxes fish from the seas,
The stag from the crag, and the thrush from the trees.

My rarest delight, could we spend the lone night,
Since he laves in the waves, till the sun bursts to light;
My head on your breast, and my spirit at rest,
Through the night on your white bosom darling caressed.

To a great house daltheen, 'tis whose baseness to clean
The squire's knives, and his gyves, my heart never shall lean,
But I'll take to the road, and I'll share his abode,
With a man, one who can, reap the crop which he sowed.

Aha! far away, does this heart from you stray,
To the pearl of a girl that's as bright as the day;
I would wander o'er Spain, over France and the Main,
Making love to that dove—how this love is sweet pain.

'Tis shameful to find, how one troubles his mind,
With the care of a fair one as fickle as wind;
Not the birds on the tree, can more numerous be,
Than the wiles and the guiles in her heart's mystery.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1856.

THE ENGLISH PRESS ON BUCHANAN'S ELECTION.

The ignorance displayed by the British press on public questions connected with this Republic, is only equalled by its insolent and audacious interference with our social institutions. It is the object of English statesmen to make the world believe that the world cannot move unless its vis inertiæ be overcome by the impetus of the myth styled Anglo-Saxonism, and that Anglo-Saxonism is at once the lever and sceptre by which the universe and the people thereof must be elevated and ruled. Anglo-Saxon energy, Anglo-Saxon civilization, invincibility, and manifest destiny have been paraded in every sea and on every shore, and rehearsed in every language, until a great portion of the human race acknowledged its inevitable supremacy. Late events, recent disasters, shameful compromise of national interests and honor, have broken this cosmopolitan faith. Anglo-political heresies are springing up in every quarter of the globe. Petty monarchs who formerly trembled at the dread name of England, now fling back taunts against remonstrance, defiance against threats.

The English press, however, still insists on the old privilege of advice and insolent dictation to countries where free institutions are the rule as well to those where it is the exception. The President of the United States of America is treated with the same want of courtesy and assailed with the same unbridled license as the veriest and most contemptible despot in Europe. It is time that the American people should rebuke the arrogant self-assumption and mischievous intermeddling in their national concerns, of which the recent Presidential election called forth such an unusual display. The old monarchical governments of Europe, of every class and shade of despotism—including the houses of Bourbon, Hanover, and Hapsburg—are alike hostile to republics. Their example is dangerous, their growth is menacing; their strength irresistible. If they cannot conquer them by open force, or plant the germs of dissolution in their soil, they invariably contrive to have their rulers well disposed towards them, and a party friendly to their policy nurtured under the shadow of their free institutions—a party, like Guy Fawkes, with muffled cloak and dark lantern, ready to lay the train, and apply the match on the first favorable opportunity. To accomplish either of those objects, the English press labored hard previous to the recent election, which has resulted in the triumph of the Democracy and the strengthening of the Union. The principles of Northern sectionalists were advocated, their acts applauded, their fanaticism, their prejudices appealed to, and the treasonable designs of some of the more outspoken leaders, broadly sanctioned. If Fremont were elected, the dissolution of the Union was fondly hoped for, a fact that shows how utterly ignorant our Anglo-Saxon political censors are, for the large Northern vote cast for Buchanan would form a barrier strong enough to resist New England or Old England aggression upon the principles of the Constitution. But, if the election of Fremont did not bear dissolution-fruit, it would have given to the United States a President friendly to England—a President supported by the whole press, and sustained by the whole mercantile influence of England in this country. Of course he would look lightly over the faults of his Anglo-Saxon patrons. Encroachments on Central America, and enlistment-violations in the heart of the Union, would be mere trifles in comparison with the preserving of "friendly relations."

The aggressive policy of England, so long and so silently carried out on this Continent, but vigorously checked by the determined and statesman-like action of the present Administration, might have been safely renewed. All those hopes and aspirations have been blighted by the election of James Buchanan, and the defeat of the foreign nominee has accordingly lashed the English press into such a rabid fury, that no deference is paid to the expressed will of the majority of the Republic, and the President elect is vilified and maligned by every organ of the British Government. When Louis Napoleon caused himself to be elected by his Prætorian cohorts, the English press, assuming that he was the choice of the French nation, maintained a dignified silence, or only wrote to support and extol the homicide of December. But they do not even maintain a decent silence in the case of James Buchanan, who has been constitutionally called to the Presidential chair. The London Economist, the organ of the Treasury, thus misrepresents the policy of the Democratic party, and vilifies Mr. Buchanan:—"It seems certain that Mr. Buchanan has been chosen President by a large majority. It is the victory of the party whose principles of policy are the extension of Slavery, the acquisition of fresh territory in order to aid that extension, and the destruction of the few remaining restraints on popular tyranny which the wisdom of the founders of the American Constitution had established. Three characteristics more fatal to peace and progress can scarcely be imagined. The Buchanan Government, if it be true to the avowed doctrines of its chief and his active supporters, will be violent and retrogressive at home, aggressive and filibustering abroad. We cannot forget that Mr. Buchanan has been deliberately and elaborately a mischief-maker—more dangerous even, because more decent, than M. Pierre Soule. He was the moving spirit of the Ostend Conference, where freebooting doctrines were consolidated into a manifesto; and the Central American was his own pet affair—not Mr. Pierce's—it was got up and kept alive by his perverse ingenuity alone. His elevation, therefore, of itself, is a fact disturbing and deplorable enough."

The London Times still hopes for the dissolution of the Union. The defeat which its clients have sustained does not destroy the chances of dissolution; it only postpones them. It believes it sees the North arrayed in deadly hostility to the South, and sneers at the Constitution, and prophesies all manner of evil: "The strength of the North is in its wealth, its population and its industry, advantages which the Constitution did not give and which its abrogation will not take away. When the contest, therefore, has reached its ultimate conditions, the South will find in the Constitution a shield, and the North an obstacle, and the position of the two parties with respect to it are likely to be reversed. The South is embarked in a career in which it cannot stop. It has scorned compromise, and boldly aims at supremacy. The point must be reached at last at which the North will concede no further, and it will then be seen if the Constitution is strong enough to restrain the furious antipathies hitherto content to fight within its limits."

The London Press, a Conservative organ under the control of Mr. Disraeli, chimes in with the Times, and believes that the apple of discord is only ripening, and that it hangs upon a bad bough, quite convenient for plucking. It says:—"The slavery question is not materially affected by this election; or, so far as it is affected at all, the election has only shown the insecurity of the foundation on which the Union rests. The difference between the two parties is irreconcilable; it is increasing in intensity; it admits of no compromise, and sooner or later it must come to that point when mutual repugnance will dictate terms of separation, or when hate will bring forth open war to determine the supremacy."

And again, in another part of the article, from which we quote, the same organ adds:—"The Slavery question has not been settled—it has only been postponed; and it is from its very nature of such a kind, that if no external events occur to give an unlooked-for stimulus to national feeling and to band all statesmen together, whatever their differences on questions of domestic policy, it must tend to wrench the Union asunder."

It broadly asserts that "for the first time since the declaration of independence there is a complete separation between North and South," and of course is gratified to think that on this assumption the Union is doomed. This same Conservative organ not only threatens this country with the displeasure and hostility of England, under certain contingencies, but with that of France also. We are told that the affairs of the West as well as of the East induced their alliance, and still form a strong bond to hold its loosened folds together. It says:—"We must acknowledge the force of that law by which a superior race extends its limits at the expense of an inferior race. But it is possible that the government of the United States, under the Presidency of Mr. Buchanan, may desire to proceed further. The district which commands the passage between the two oceans is yet in dispute. The neutrality of that territory was guaranteed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but we have no security, considering the points in dispute between the two governments, and the unsettled state of the region, that the administration of Mr. Buchanan may not attempt to incorporate the isthmus with the territory of the United States. On this question, and indeed on all questions of policy touching our relations with the United States, the interests of France are identical with our interests. France is pledged like this country, never to allow the territory of the isthmus to fall under the dominion of the United States, or of any other power. Should the government of the United States seek, on any pretence whatever, to abridge the rights or seize the possessions of European nations in America, be they mainland or inland, a firm resistance must undoubtedly be made. The Monroe doctrine, to which Mr. Buchanan is committed, admits of a placable and satisfactory interpretation; but it admits of one, also, of a directly contrary nature. While our alliance subsists with France, the statesmen of the Union must well know that no loophole is allowed them for encroaching on European rights. This alliance is as sure a guarantee against the cravings of ambition in the West as it has proved in the East. The election of Mr. Buchanan has supplied one more powerful reason why this alliance should be maintained, and will determine all honest politicians to discountenance those insidious efforts which are being made in both countries to undermine it."

It is made clear by the few extracts we have quoted from the English press that the triumph of Buchanan has been the defeat of the foreign candidate of the oligarchy of England and the Emperor of France. The brave men who stood by the Constitution unmasking the conspirators and planting the heel of the Republic upon the head of the English serpent, have performed a noble duty to their country, and rendered a lasting service to the cause of human freedom. North and South, obedient to the instincts of self-preservation and honoring the free institutions which have made the United States a model for human governments, will fling back with contempt the impertinent interference of their old enemy with the free action of the people of America.

Although England forms one of the royal family of nations, and may be, therefore, hostile to Republican Governments, especially when they are intimately connected with the governments of Europe—that is not the only reason why she regards with a jealous eye the rapid progress in wealth, commerce, and territorial expansion, which the United States have made during the last quarter of a century. England has more vital interests at stake—something more than the waning shadow of royalty to contend for. She has her Canadian possessions nearer to our borders than her Indian empire is to the throne of the Czar. Her supremacy of the seas is endangered by the merchant navies of America. The Young Republic, if it would wield anything symbolical of royalty, might seize the trident of Neptune and rule the waves of every ocean. In short, the assaults of the English pens upon the President elect, his party, and his followers, are dictated by the most selfish motives, and are hostile to the the principles which govern the great masses of the American people.

MITCHEL'S LECTURE ON FOREIGN INFLUENCE.

Mr. Mitchel's Lecture, at the Tabernacle, on the 12th, as we anticipated, was a complete success. The enthusiasm of his reception was indescribable. The discourse was an exceedingly powerful one, every sentence being substantiated by a fact, which was rendered still more peculiarly effective by the keen, brilliant, and vigorous characteristics of the lecturer's well-known style. As Mr. Mitchel intends to deliver his useful and timely discourse elsewhere, we are of course prohibited from giving more than a clear outline of it, which we are enabled to do from his own manuscript.

The Lecturer commenced by saying he had no intention to raise a warning voice against naturalized citizens, to alarm his hearers by narratives of the intrigues of Jesuits, or harrow their feelings by stories of the burning of Protestants at the stake; for all those matters, are they not written in the newspaper of Brooks, the campaign novels of the Know-Nothings, and the archives of Lodge 1244. But, he continued, that there has been, from of old, a powerful Foreign Influence at work in this Republic cannot assuredly be denied; for George Washington, who said nothing in vain, uttered in his Farewell Address this paternal warning—"Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence it behooves you to be at all times upon your guard." But that this could not have been intended to caution one class of citizens against the insidious wiles of another class was plain from the very fact that in this very document, the political testament of Washington to his countrymen, he addressed himself expressly to both classes of citizens—viz., to those who were born and to those who were not born upon American soil, in those remarkable words, "Citizens by birth or choice, of a common country." Citizens by choice or citizens by chance, it was all one to Washington. Both were Americans in those days; and both were with equal earnestness warned against Foreign Influence. What then was this foreign influence?

The lecturer proceeded to show that the only foreign influence dreaded by the Father of his country was neither more nor less than the influence of the British Government—that that Government, after it was compelled to give up its political predominance over these colonies had immediately addressed itself to extend and establish a commercial influence, the influence of opinion, of fashion, and above all, of literature—that the means of establishing this sort of influence was the fomenting of sectional and geographical dissension: for he wrote, in 1784, "Our newly acquired friends, the British, are already, and professedly, acting upon this ground, and wisely too, if we are determined to persevere in our folly. They know that individual opposition to their measures is futile; and boast that we are not sufficiently united as a nation to give a general one." From that day to this our newly acquired friends, that is our eternal and implacable enemies, the British Government and ruling class, have been but too industrious in this direction, and with too signal success; insomuch, that if America is no longer politically a subject colony, it is nevertheless, through that commercial, social, and literary ascendancy, a real and most useful province of the British Empire.

The lecturer next traced the several means by which this British influence has been confirmed—mentioned especially the entire literary provincialism of this Republic, and how completely Great Britain through that agency controls the opinions of America; for they who import their books, import their opinions; and this is true provincialism, and a real and most mischievous Foreign Influence.

As to the use made of this foreign influence—it was employed first against the Constitution and the sovereign rights of the Southern States; next against the Constitution and the civic rights of Irish born citizens. During the last Presidential campaign all the British influence was used for Fremont in the North, for Fillmore in the South. The Free Soil faction, which called itself "the North," was supplied with the cant of British philanthropy—the Know-Nothings, who had the presumption to term themselves "the Americans," were stimulated industriously by British true-blue Protestantism, by the delusion that the Americans and the English were of one great Anglo-Saxon stock, with a common blood and a common religion, and by the example of the English Ecclesiastical titles bill, and the wrecking of Catholic Churches in England. About three years ago began the Know-Nothing riots in New-York and Brooklyn. Who excited those riots? Gavazzi, an Italian renegade priest, who came here from England, and having done his mischievous duty, went back to England for his reward. Who led on the rowdy congregations? The British Angel Gabriel. Who wrecked the Catholic Churches of Newark? The Irish Orange Lodges, consisting of a species of Irishmen who were always willing tools of every British atrocity, and who, generally, like their British masters and owners, despised the citizenship of the country which afforded them a home. All these were foreign influences. To show the complete ascendency of the British over the Free-Soil agitators, the lecturer read some extracts from the Anti-Slavery lectures of Theodore Parker, and the late work of Emerson, entitled "English Traits;" some of these extracts showed Mr. Emerson to be completely inspired and possessed by the British spirit: for example, he declares that "nothing savage, nothing mean resides in the English heart"—that the English "are as good as they are handsome"—that they have "a resolution to see fair play," and in a paroxysm of Anglo-Saxon flunkeyism he exclaims, "Whilst they are some ages ahead of the rest of the world in the art of living, whilst in some directions they do not represent the modern spirit, but constitute it, this vanguard of civility and power they coldly hold, marching in phalanx, lock-step, foot after foot, file after file of heroes, ten thousand deep"—but the most amazing of all is this extraordinary avowal of the supernatural influence exercised over him by the mere look of an English audience. "It was an odd proof of this impressive energy, that in my lectures I hesitated to read, for its impertinence, many a disparaging phrase which I had been accustomed to spin about poor, thin, unable mortals, so much had the fine physique and personal vigor of this robust race worked on my imagination." Lectures which he had prepared in America, adapted to the poor, thin, unable mortals of these parts, he was actually ashamed to read before that race of demigods! Now, Mr. Emerson was a principal litterateur and lecturer of the Anti-Slavery faction; and the question is, was he, or was he not, acting under British influence? Why, he was inspired by those Britons, mesmerized by them, possessed by them as visibly, as if one saw him bodily entered by Dr. Rabelais' thirty thousand cart-loads of black devils.

Both those factions, then, the Free-Soil and the Know-Nothing, were created and sustained by foreign influence. Both those foreign influences had been baffled, defeated and routed by the last Presidential election; and the Lecturer was proud to say, as an Irishman, that no class of citizens in the Republic had been so unanimous and so resolved in resisting and baffling those foreign influences as the Irish. Buchanan could not have been elected, but that four Northern States had voted for him; in those four States his majorities were much less than one half the Irish votes in those States respectively. If those Irish-born voters had not been there—or if they had voted for Fremont, or for Fillmore, or if they had even been divided, as the German and native citizens were, Mr. Fremont would now be President of one half the disunited States. The Irish-born voters then, were the surest barrier against both those mischievous foreign influences and against all foreign influence. As for the ignorant cry against Catholics, it was to be treated with utter contempt; it was not to be reasoned with, but defied and ignominiously trampled under foot. So far as he, the Lecturer, was concerned, he had no spiritual guidance at present, and acknowledged no spiritual superior under heaven; he asserted for himself and stood upon and fully practised the sacred right of private stupidity; but asserted his absolute right, as a citizen, the moment he saw fit, to submit his private judgment or misjudgment to the jurisdiction of the Catholic Church, or of any other Church, whether its spiritual head resided at Rome, in China, in America, or in the Sandwich islands; and if he should do so, he would probably be not a worse, but a better citizen of the United States. At all events, one thing was certain, the Presidential campaign had proved that the most resolute champions of the American idea of government, and the firmest opponents of foreign influence upon this soil, were those voters who were accustomed to confess to a priest, who was ordained by a bishop, who was appointed by a Pope at Rome. Instinct and reason alike exhort us, Irish, to resist British opinion and to defy the cant of British sentimental morality. None are so deeply interested in the development of the genuine American idea, as we—none so strongly bound to make good the principle that America is to be ruled by Americans; that is, by citizens of the United States; and none so deeply concurred in laying to heart the text of Washington—"Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, it behooves you to be at all times upon your guard."

THE DEVIN REILLY TESTIMONIAL.

On the 29th inst., John Mitchel lectures on the "Life and Death of Thomas Devin Reilly," for the benefit of the fund which is to perpetuate the esteem in which this brave young patriot was held, by exhibiting a careful, tender, and manly solicitude for the loved ones he has left behind.

The deep-seated affection which was mutual between Devin Reilly and Mitchel—the identity of the principles which made both famous, and the complete knowledge of his young ally and friend which Mitchel is possessed of, will render the lecture one of deep personal feeling and broad historic significance.

Those who cannot afford a subscription to the fund, can desire no better opportunity of testifying to the purity of its objects, than is afforded by the lecture. Let all such attend.

NICARAGUA—THE RED STAR STILL IN THE ASCENDANT.

The Central American War still continues to be a leading topic of conversation, speculation, and private and public comment. The contest which lately seemed to be drawing quickly to a triumphant and stable close, now appears to be raging with a vigor, the news of which took us somewhat by surprise, even though the public are now well accustomed to the vigorous, impromptu, and brilliant manœuvres of General Walker.

The energy and prompt foresight of the President of Nicaragua continues to astonish even those who are best acquainted with the characteristics which have made his the strong name of the middle of this century, and which have revived in his person the daring romance of the Spanish captains and filibusters—men such as Cordova, Cortez, Grijalva, Alvarado, and the old soldier who became their historian, Bernal Diaz del Castillo, whose conquest of Spanish America gave the country they took possession of a chivalric and picturesque though bloody history, which has alone preserved it from that obscurity to which a lazy, worthless and effete population would consign it.

As General Walker continues to render the faith of his friends invincible, he flings death and dismay with a still relentlessly avenging arm among the shattered, broken, flying ranks of the enemies of his State.

The latest news by the Tennessee confirms the account of the successes reported by the steamship Texas to the New Orleans press on the 12th.

By these advices we learn that four days' fighting at Massaya had ended in the complete defeat of the enemy, three thousand of whom, it is estimated, have fallen in the several battles which have taken place since October.

On the 10th ultimo, General Hornsby, with two hundred men, defeated eleven hundred of the enemy under the Costa Rican General, Canas. The enemy lost 200, while Hornsby had only 2 killed and 11 wounded.

Having found it necessary to evacuate Granada on account of the sickness which prevails so extensively among the white residents, General Walker determined to burn the place, that it might not again be fortified by the enemy. Not a vestige of the place remains.

General Walker had removed the sick and wounded to the island of Ometope, and was awaiting the arrival of the new recruits to attack Rivas, having left General Henningsen to remove the stores, and finish the destruction of Granada.

On the 23d of Nov., a brilliant naval engagement took place in the harbor of San Juan del Sur between the Nicaraguan schooner Granada, of two six-pounders and 28 men, Lieut. C. J. Faysaux commanding, and the Costa Rican brig Eleventh of April, formerly American brig Dover, of six nine-pounders and 114 men, well armed with minie rifles. The battle lasted two hours when a shot from the schooner struck the magazine of the brig and caused an explosion. Lieutenant Faysaux immediately lowered his boats, and picked up forty of her crew, many of whom were terribly burned. Among the rescued were the captain, second lieutenant and chaplain of the brig.

The brig had on board a large supply of stores, ammunition, and $25,000 for the allied army.

Thus is the Red Star still in the ascendant.

The flag of Hermando Cortez,—colored cross, gleaming on a black ground, and surrrounded by blue and white flames—was not more indicative of the man who bore it, and the successful programme of which it may be taken as the symbol, than is the Red Star of Nicaragua symbolic of the steady burning fervor of the Chief who inspires and conducts its destiny.

COLONEL DOHENY'S LECTURE.

Colonel Doheny will deliver a lecture at the Tabernacle on the 22nd inst., upon "The Rock of Cashel, its Kings, Priests and Soldiers—its Poetry, Calamities and Glory." The subject is deeply interwoven with some of the most interesting, historical, and legendary incidents in Irish history. Handled, as it will be, in the vigorous and lucid style of the eloquent lecturer it cannot fail to be highly attractive. We must all be there to take a glance at the Tower-crowned Rock of old Cashel of the Kings, and get a peep into the ivy-mantled ruins of Cormac's Chapel.

FRENCH COLONIZATION IN AFRICA.

The encroachments which France is steadily making upon the territories of the native tribes in Africa have excited the jealousy and alarm of England. While the British ministry privately protests, France extends her frontiers and increases her influence, and compels the Bey of Tunis to do homage to her flag. A correspondent of the London Times says, that "in spite of British protests, Tunis will eventually form part of French Africa, no traveler can doubt who listens to the conversation of Frenchmen, and who marks how easily the French move their columns across the frontier to punish a fugitive tribe, or how peremtorily they require the Bey to fire salutes upon their fete days."

IRISH CELEBRITIES.

JOHN PHILPOT CURRAN.

NOTES BY THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER.

"At length," thus he writes home from London, whither he had gone to eat his way through a routine of bad dinners to the Bar, "at length I raised myself from the mournful reverie into which I had fallen, and set out in search of some old acquaintances. But I sought them sorrowing, for there was not one to be found." Amid the gaieties of Paris, he tells Plowden he "can see no one—that he is miserable in health and spirits." From Cheltenham, in the summer of 1817, he writes to a friend in Dublin, telling him, that "many recollections are lying like lead upon his heart"—that "as for hope, he had altogether closed his accounts with her"—that "she had been perpetually drawing upon his credulity"—and "was nothing to him but an insolvent swindler." He meets Henry Grattan one day, a little later, and tells him it is his wish "to go to Spain, borrow a beard, and turn Monk." Charles Phillips shows him to us in the decline of life, wandering about his beautiful grounds at midnight, seeing in the future nothing for hope, and in the past nothing but disappointment. And Thomas Davis points him out to us, weighed down by grief, in sickness and in utter loneliness of heart, bitterly weeping over the fate of Ireland, beside the grave of his little daughter, in a small grove, outside the garden.

A deep tone of sadness vibrates all through this noble life. All the flowers which beautify it, seem to have sprung from the earth where the dead are sleeping. The liveliest songs that made it musical, seem to have come from out the sad foliage of such trees as the cypress and the yew. Yet over all, and through all, there shone more or less intensely as the season changed, the light of a divine genius; and whether, like the river beside which he was born, it was shadowed by rocks and clouds, or sparkled in the sunlight amongst the white lilies, or grew still in a broad expanse over the ruins of other days, or kissed the ringlets of flowery islands, or deepened and darkened under the walls and ships and tumult of the great city, the current of his soul was ever fresh, ever beautiful, ever strong.

But if that melancholy mood of his was the prevailing mood; if, at every striking of the clock, it overcast his great career; if he cannot remind Lord Avonmore of those Attic nights they spent together, without drawing tears in quick profusion from the good old judge; if, to Lady Charlotte Rawdon [he cannot present a copy of Carolan's Irish airs, without writing on the title-page those words of sublime sorrow—"by the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept when we remembered thee, O Zion!"—if such were his prevailing mood, we find a sufficient reason for it in the scenes, the nursing, the incidents of his childhood.

He was born in a town called Newmarket, in the parish of Clonfert, in the barony of Duhallow, in the county of Cork, in the province of Munster, in the kingdom of Ireland. There were bubbling brooks and deep rivers, and moory up-lands and ravines, and large lonely mountains, and ruins of castles and ruins of chapels, all within sight and hearing of that house, in which, on the 24th of July, 1750, he, the son of James Curran, the Seneschal of the town, was swathed in swadling clothes.

Amongst these scenes he grew up. And as he grew up, he went to the fairs and the wakes and the weddings of the neighborhood for miles round. And he spoke there, with the boys and girls, the language of the country, and learned to love her music passionately. And from his mother, who, as Davis tells us, had "a waste of old traditions and passions lying grand and gloomy in her soul," he heard many a song and legend and wild story—many a wild story of ghost and hero and outlaw—of saint and rapparee and fairy.

No wonder his nature was such as we have found it to be. No wonder that through the golden atmosphere of his genius there was ever floating this pale mist, and that there were black clouds amongst the crimson, when the sunset came.

But that sadness was lit up, ever and anon, with loving thoughts, as we have seen; and with mirth and drollery, as we have yet to see. The river will ripple, and laugh, and sparkle sometimes. Nay! where its depth is deepest, where its brow is darkest, it will sometimes give a giddy whirl, and wildly play with trifles.

There he is in London, where a remittance of seven shillings and a boiled leg of mutton on a Sunday is a miraculous blessing to him; where, for the most part, he finds himself utterly spiritless and woe-begone; where, he falls into the dreariest dissertations concerning the vanity, and worthlesness and nothingness of life; there he is in London, waking up suddenly and making additions to his furniture—"for, my dear mother," he writes, "I have just purchased a fiddle." Then again we catch him flirting, or pretending to flirt, with a romantic young lady, who talks of the famous Edmund Burke by the familiar name of Ned, and who, to crown all, imagines she sings like a nightingale! "When it comes to this, however, as I have not the best command of my muscles," he honestly confesses, "I always propose putting out the candles." Every night we find him, in that same old dissipated city of London, for two hours at a time in a coffee-house where he watches with a roguish curiosity a knot of old politicians, who meet to discuss, over their pipes and pewter, the affairs of the day—domestic and foreign—and arrange the affairs of the nation. In his voyages of discovery—in his search after ordinaries and chop-houses and drinking-cellars—he thinks he has found out the cellar where Roderick Random eat a shin of beef for three-pence; and swears he has drank out of the identical quart which the drummer squeezed together, when poor Strap spilled the broth on his legs.

But his mirth carries him beyond all this, though it were reasonable enough for him to stop where Roderick Random had that cheap and plentiful repast. Our little Irishman grows positively profane—utterly reckless in his humor. Listen to him now! "In the house where I lodge," he writes to Jerry Keller, a famous wit at the Irish Bar, "there has been a man dead these two days. He is divided from me only by a partition. They visit him once a day, and so look him up till the next. And there he lies, without the smallest attention being paid to him—except it be a dirge from myself on the jews-harp, which I shall not omit while he continues to be my neighbor."

Well, a man who could joke about his own mishaps—who could light a fire on the dullest hearth by the side of which he happened to sit down—may be forgiven, if his merriment breaks out when the adversities of another are at an end, and death releasing the sufferer, takes possession of the wretched bed. That he did not spare his own calamities, need not be told. The world has laughed heartily, and to the end of the chapter cannot fail to laugh, at his rich and racy jokes; and those jokes, the world knows, were made at his own expense, just as much as, if not more than, at the expense of others. He jokes about his poverty. Jokes about not having a shilling in his pocket. Jokes about his seven miserable shirts, and writes to his mother to say he "wants only five more to make up the dozen." Jokes, too, about his dismal lodging on Hay Hill, Dublin; where, he says, his "wife and children were the only furniture in the apartment." Jokes about having "a family for whom he had no dinner, and a landlady for whom he had no rent." Jokes heartily about his not having this rent, and the probability of his never having it. "As to my rent," he whispers Arthur Wolfe, afterwards Lord Kilwarden, "it stands pretty much the same chance of liquidation as the National Debt."

Some years later—so late as 1812—when one might have not unreasonably supposed that the experiences of a long and stormy life had quenched the fire within him; had, at all events, so tamed his spirit, that it could no longer spread the flashing wing, and wheel and strike; even then, we find him, with all his seriousness, with all his sadness, now and then, as bright, as vivacious, as agile as of old. A deputation call upon him to stand as candidate for the representation in Parliament of the town of Newry. He goes down there, and finds himself face to face with General Needham—a steady and conscienceless adherent of the Government—a steady and remorseless enemy of the country. The contest lasts five days. Curran resigns on the sixth. Resigning, however—quitting the field—he lets fly a score of Parthian arrows on the foe. "You saw," he said, "the unfortunate beings who voted for him. A succession of poor creatures without clothes upon their backs—naked, as if they had been stripped for execution—naked, as if they had been landed from their mothers, and consigned to the noble General at the moment of their births—no part of them covered but their chins, as if nature had stuck a beard upon them in derision of their destiny."

Such jokes may sound strangely out of tune. Strangely out of tune, where the scene is a winter scene, and the wind passes through it like a wild lament. But they come from the Irish heart, and through that winter scene, and the cold wind, and over the face of swollen streams, they wildly, grandly, vehemently vibrate.

THE MONKS OF THE SCREW.

In a ruined old house, the windows of which are broken—in a shadowy spacious hall, into which we enter through a door with a pointed arch and an iron grating—there runs a long deal table, covered with dishes, all smoking; decanters, all sparkling; fruit, all fragrant and fresh; having in the centre an immense earthenware bowl, odoriferous with floating lemons. On either side of this long deal table are seated some sixteen people, all clad in the strangest costume. Each one has a skull-cap. A large gown of light drab cloth, gathered round the waist with a rope, invests the frame from neck to heel. A leather string, falling from a hempen girdle, secures with a stout knot a horn-spoon of huge dimensions. Two fiddlers are in attendance. Two of the humbler brethren of the Order, habited in gowns of gray serge, are placing and displacing dishes, replenishing exhausted bottles, and with much gravity baling out the punch. We are face to face with the famous Monks of the Screw—a convivial club, composed of the brightest wits and the noblest men and orators of the time—of men, with very few exceptions, over whose ashes the fondest tears of Ireland have been shed.

There, for instance, is Dean Kirwan, the great preacher, of whom it has been grandly said that "in feeding the lamp of charity he exhausted the lamp of life; that with him the preacher's desk became a throne of light; that he shook one world with the thunders of another; but that the curse of Swift was on him—he was an Irishman and a man of genius, and used his genius for the benefit of his country."

There is Charles Kendal Bushe, afterwards Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, with his sweet smile, eye beaming with benevolence, noble features, stately figure, and tongue of exquisite tone.

There is Peter Burrowes, with his good-humored face and portly figure, who rolls himself through the streets with his hands in his breeches pockets; his eyes glaring on his oldest friend as if he had never seen him; who to an intellect the most vigorous unites simplicity the most childlike; and of whom, amongst many other odd things, it has been told, so absent is he, that a brother barrister found him one morning, at breakfast-time, standing by the fire, with an egg in his hand and his watch in the saucepan.

Next to him is the Right Hon. John Hely Hutchinson, Provost of the University of Dublin, whom Charles James Fox pronounces to be "one of the most eminent jobbers in Ireland;" who had one of his daughters gazetted to a troop of dragoons; who, having attained the Prime Sergeantcy, the Secretaryship of State, and twenty other great places, insisted on a mayor's half-pay from the Lord Lieutenant; and of whom Lord Townshend, wearied out at his incessant applications for office, used to exclaim—"By Heavens! if I gave Hutchinson England and Scotland for an estate, he would solicit the Isle of Man for a potato-garden!"

And there is Barry Yelverton—soon to be known as Lord Avonmore—Chief Baron of the Exchequer, who had derived his ideas of civil liberty from the purest fountains of Athens and of Rome—feeding, as his eloquent and generous companion said, the youthful vigor of his studious mind with the knowledge of the wisest philosophers and statesmen—the anticipated Christianity of Socrates, the gallant and pathetic patriotism of Epaminondas, the pure austerity of Fabricius.

And there is John Egan, chairman or judge of Quarter Sessions of Kilmainham, better known as Bully Egan; a man of immense stature; as brawny, and almost as black, as a coal-porter; an honest, blunt, fearless fellow; with a good heart, high spirit, and rough eloquence; who, on being threatened with the loss of his Kilmainham Judgeship if he voted against the Union, unburdened his big soul in a tremendous phillippic against the government, winding up with the exclamation—"Ireland for ever, and be damned to Kilmainham!"

And there is Harry Grattan himself!

But who presides? Who is at the head of the deal table? Who the saintly Prior that regulates the feast? Who the ruling spirit of that quaint world of fun? Who that little dark man, with protruding under-lip, small flat nose, brown cheek, and "an eye like a live coal?" The same we have seen, years ago, in Newmarket, where, as he said himself, he was "a little ragged apprentice to every kind of idleness and mischief." The same we have seen going on board the ship at George's Quay, bidding good-bye to Ireland with a heavy heart. The same we have seen thumbing the Jew's-harp over his dead neighbor in London. The same we have seen on Hay Hill, Dublin, where he had "a family for whom he had no dinner, and a landlady for whom he had no rent." It is, as we all know, John Phillpot Curran! And there he is, in his drab gown and skull-cap, with his hempen girdle, and the blessed spoon and cork-screw dangling at his side—there he is, at the head of the choicest and grandest spirits that ever met together at the social board.

That the evenings on which they held their convivial chapters were the brightest ever known in Ireland, no one familiar with the men of whom the order is composed, and who bears in mind the exuberant drollery of their worthy master, can have a doubt—Curran's wit is as widely known as his name; every one—the world over!—has a little specimen of it, and wears it in a locket of Wicklow gold, set in Irish diamonds—a charm against the heartache and the blue devils, though their name were Legion.

Every one knows what he said, when some one told him Lord Clonmel, a great enemy of his, was about to die, at last: "I believe," said Curran, "he is scoundrel enough to live or die, just as it suits his own convenience." Every one knows what he said, on being told that a very slovenly and stingy barrister had started for the Continent with a shirt and a guinea. "He'll not change either till he comes back," says Curran. Every one knows, or should know, what he said about the Limerick banker who had an iron leg, and was notorious for his hardness of heart: "My dear fellow," says he, "that leg of his is the softest part of him." Every one knows, or should know what he said of Sergeant Hewitt's speech. "The learned Sergeant's speech," he said, "put me exactly in mind of a familiar article in domestic use, commonly called a candle extinguisher. It began at a point, and on it went, widening and widening, until, at last, it fairly put the question out altogether."

But he was gifted with something more than wit, with something more than genius, with something more than a genial, generous, impressionable, loving nature. He was gifted with an unconquerable courage. A courage which nothing could dismay, nothing intimidate, nothing could subdue. The Crown, with all its resources of fraud and force, he feared not. The Bench, on which the worst of men sat in judgment, he feared not. The Yeomanry, who used to crowd the Court and brandish their weapons in his face, he feared not. He had a spirit that could confront, grapple with, and defy them all. For the licentious nobleman who wrecked the hopes, the happiness and honor of the poor man's house, for the savage soldier who went prowling through the city, breaking open houses, and laying foul hands on gentleness, and innocence, and beauty, and everything that was sacred, and everything that should have been inviolable; for the spy who had wound himself into the confidence of his victim, had been welcomed to his fireside, had played with the ringlets of the children whilst weaving and twisting the halter for the father; for the wealthiest, the boldest, the most desperate criminal of them all, he had a blow which made them reel, and the mark of which they bore through life, and carried with them to the grave.

THOUGHTS IN AN ORCHARD.

The day is mild—not dark—and yet not bright,
And fairy gossamers bestrew the ground;
Some holy rapture now imparts delight,
And silent loveliness smiles all around.

The little throstle, with its plaintive note,
Proclaims that sullen winter soon shall come;
The social robin strains his dulcet throat,
And weird wood-birds peck the mellow plum.

The frozen sloe assumes a purple dye,
A magic mildness fascinates the scene;
And Fauns and Dryads, in quaint Fancy's eye,
Beneath the sylvan branches may be seen.

With rustic sceptre, now, Vertumnus reigns,
In these his haunts, with influence serene;
Here, mindful of her favorite domains,
Dispensing balm, Pomona strays unseen.

The halcyon beam is tremulous with mirth,
My spirit fain would hear som ærial voice;
The happy moments seem not now of earth,
All nature's glad, and heaven and earth rejoice.

Oh! that my hours were wholly spent as this;
That thus the mind from earthly care could soar!
Then could I smile in unalloyéd bliss,
Serenely live—nor ever wish for more.

MEMORY'S CALL.

Oh give me the scene, of my childhood's dream,
The home of my boyhood's hours,
The murmuring brook, in the forest nook,
The birds and the wild-wood bowers:
And again recall, my playmates all,
That merry throng of yore,
From the willow's shade, in the silent glade,
And the wide-world scattered o'er.

Then again we'll rove, through bower and grove,
And pluck the sweet jasmine,
Or repose again, in the fairy glen,
O'erhung with the trellised vine:
Through our forest home, once more we'll roam,
And chase the bounding deer,
And again recline, 'neath the branching pine,
To share our hunting cheer.

The feathery oar, we'll grasp once more,
And speed the light canoe,
Or the tiny sail, to the fav'ring gale,
We'll spread with a wild halloo.
O'er the glassy tide, we'll gaily glide,
Along each bay and cove,
And when noontide glows, invite repose,
We'll away to the shady grove.

When twilight shades, steal through the glades,
Once more to the village green,
With maidens all, from cot and hall,
To dance 'neath the starry sheen.
At the witching hour, to the moonlit bower,
We'll steal with our chosen maid,
With honey'd kiss, and tones of bliss,
Young love's sweet cause to plead.

But alas—alas! there is no recall,
Mine agéd lips but rave—
The tide of Time's an eternal ebb,
It knows no flooding wave:
No gentle sun can melt the frosts
Of Age on the hoary head,
Nor woo from their frozen graves the hopes,
And joys, long drooped and dead.

LOVE'S LABOR LOST.

The Adventures of a Roving Diplomatist. By Henry Wikoff, author of "My Courtship and its Consequences." W. P. Fetridge & Co.

However one may be inclined to offer balm to the seared heart of Mr. Wikoff—however one may deplore the failure of his enthusiastic overtures to, and amatory designs upon his "former fiancée, Miss Gamble," it must be conceded by those who—waiving any consideration or re-consideration of his devoted principles—has his best interests at heart, that on the whole, in a monetary point of view, the diplomatic lover will be, if he has not been, more fortunate in his failure than had hymenial success crowned his arduous and ardent career in search of a "partner for his bosom."

Industry will have its reward; and the almost superhuman exertions of Mr. Wikoff will ultimately triumph over, or under, the wiles of the inhuman conspirators, who leagued to make the world believe he was a speculative Lothario, and the fair object of his frantic zeal, a woman of obdurate heart. But if Lord Viscount Palmerston and the whole diplomatic corps on the European continent have, by the application of their relentless hate and unceasing state-craft, succeeded, to some slight extent, in making the world believe Miss Gamble was above his hopes, the undivided passion, the still touching solicitude of Mr. Wikoff's nature, may reasonably console him*self* to the fact, that the lady was below so devoted and disinterested a love.

This, to be sure, may appease the demands of his pride; but, oh! can it restore his peace of mind? Ah! oh!

Were Mr. Wikoff a Petrarch, he would have singed his soul out in the slowly consuming fire of innumerable sonnets. Were he a Don Quixote, all the windmills in Holland would not have turned him from the difficulties imposed by the witchery of Love. Were he a Milton, in the promise of his spring, he would have consoled himself with the belief that his republican principles but furnished too strong grounds for his monarchical enemies to stand between him and his first love, and he would have dashed into a work against marriage. Were he some sensitive Keats, he would have perished, "heart-stifled," while some hungry critic, taking the opportunity to make himself famous, would give out that Wikoff died, not so much from the individual weakness of his heart, as from the strength of the critic's articles upon it. Were he a Tommy Moore, the thorn in his breast would never have been discovered beneath the profusion of rose-buds strung around his thorax: like the flippant devotee, he would have sung with arrant zest—

"To love you is pleasant enough,
But oh! 'tis delicious to hate you."

Were he a Free-lover, he would have madly sought in the fascinations of the many the "delights of the social circle" so unsociably withheld by the one. Were he a spiritual-medium, he would have rapped up all the deadly night-shades, from Helen of Troy to the latest faithless deceased, and by a tortuous examination of the secrets of their prison-house, find some filmy faith to support the solitude of his own. Were he an Angel Gabriel, he would have blown his horn to his latest breath, with all that brazen congeniality so identical between them. Were he a strong-minded old woman, of either or neither sex, his energy and eloquence would have made the lords of creation the laughing-stock of the century, and have raised the bloomer tunic as high above the knee of fashion as the crinoline hoop is distant from it.

Were he anything, or in fact everything, but the tender-hearted, philanthropic personage he is, there could be no answering for the lamentations his untimely end would inspire; the censure his heartlessness might demand; the stuffed ears his brazen horn would intimidate; the sociability his free-loving vengeance would smash up; or the probable revolution his political power would incite.

It is, therefore, fortunate for us—fortunate for society—fortunate, not only for America but for Europe, with which Mr. Wikoff evidently has relations of a startling and stealthy nature, that he is just the man he is. It is also, we think, very fortunate for himself that he is not anybody else—for had anybody else fallen in love with Miss Gamble, and undergone the consequences of of such a courtship, we take it as a fact indisputable, that nobody else could have made so much, indeed, anything like half so much out of the affair as Mr. Henry Wikoff.

Miss Gamble has been a veritable Egeria to Mr. Wikoff. She has inspired him to all that has made him a great notoriety. The mind of Numa Pompilius never was more the recipient of its best thoughts from his "young Aurora," the "sweet creation of his heart," as Byron apostrophised Egeria, than that of Wikoff has been the offspring of the Gamble. The Genoese prison was as good as a sacred grove to him; and as his Roman prototype, introduced all his laws and regulations in the name of his fabled goddess, so the American swain excuses his books in the name of the mythic influence of Miss Gamble's troth. Humbug is as powerful over the minds of the masses now, as its elder sister Superstition was in the days of the Roman monarch. Humbug is powerful, and being well disguised as Truth, must prevail.

After Numa Pompilius, the Wikoff. To be sure there are some slight differences between them. The former was honored for his quiet and solitary communings with Egeria, while "I," says Mr. Wikoff "was immured fifteen months in a Genoese prison for no other offence than obtaining a stolen interview with the object of my penchant." That this unjustifiable outrage was perpetrated by the British Consul, one Brown, the luckily luckless hero flattered himself he had made apparent in his former work.

The present one is undertaken to further exhibit the diplomatic machinations which were conjured against him—to show that Miss Gamble's maiden tenderness was only used as a pretext by, and screen for, the persecutors who made European affairs a secondary matter to the cribbing, cabining and confining of Henry Wikoff. To make the case more startling, the writer charges the cutest old fox in Europe with being the head and front of the conspiracy against him: the old fox aforesaid being "no less than the British Minister for Foreign Affairs, Lord Viscount Palmerston." Although a clue to the labyrinthine mystery which surrounded his fate was in possession of the author at the period of his former publication, he, with a generosity pardonably heroic, withheld the revelations which he now makes with poignant reluctance. The fond memories of his former secret relations with Lord Palmerston, plead strongly against publication. But alas for the sincerity of human friendship and the gratitude of English ministers, Lord Palmerston's behavior to his quondam American Agent has been "harsh." The latter has actually been accused of not having, and never having had any connection with the English government, a charge, which strangely enough rouses the ire of our American to a more than English official pitch. He is not at all ashamed of such connection, but on the contrary considers that disrepute and suffering were the natural consequences of not having a connection with the English government; and as Lord Palmerston, "for his own reasons," withholds acknowledgement from Wikoff, Wikoff, for his own reasons, believes his character as a roving diplomatist should not be impaired, impugned, or made doubtful by the chilling denial of so able a master as Palmerston.

Every one must see at a glance that Wikoff has been a very ill-used, although a very great man. A full and true account is herein given of when and how he joined the agents of Lord Palmerston, whose policy our American admits (p. 123) to be "intensely national." "He will," says Wikoff, "push English influence, and advance English interests, in every quarter and against everybody;" America of course included. A little farther on, the Chevalier becomes patriotic for a purpose, and reiterates many very comical things in a small space about the liberties of the world being centered in England. On these points he dribbles like a pious child of Exeter Hall. He desired to share Palmerston's onerous duties, and offered to undertake the conciliation and, we suppose, the civilization of America—for the latter always enters into benevolent British projects. His exertions to do likewise by France, and his "efforts towards disarming the hostility of the French press towards England, its government and institutions, were at the time highly praised and marvelled at." At least, so says Wikoff. The conciliation of America, however, did not meet the Minister's approval, and, in fact the Foreign Office was base enough to attempt a riddance of the astute Wikoff and his marvellous services, which the facetious and patronizing agent alludes to as an "ill-considered attempt" on the part of the said Foreign Office.

Hear our Roving Diplomatist summing up his Anglo-American policy:

"I never doubted at the time that Lord Palmerston's anxious object was to approach closer than ever before to the United States, for England was in danger of a league of Despots, who considered her free press a standing cause of disorder in Europe. Lord Palmerston himself was denounced as a 'firebrand' in every Court of the Continent; and, uncertain as was the direction France would take, it was, I conceived, a judicious policy in his Lordship to tighten the bonds of Amity with the Union, which would not have hesitated, by a spontaneous burst of feeling to lend her co-operation to rescuing the liberties of the world had the armies of Europe sailed towards England."

After taking this mighty Christian, patriotic and world-preserving view of the politics and policies of the day, is it to be wondered at that the soul of a Wikoff was "really surprised" that it had given "offense to the noble Foreign Secretary by advocating a policy so many motives combined to recommend!" Poor tender-hearted soul—his cards were played out—it was enough to shock the nerves of one less sensitive, not to say less sensible. Notwithstanding Mr. Wikoff had accepted the situation "without solicitation" and "at a sacrifice," and all that sort of thing; and was employed to carry out "a liberal—especially a pacific policy," (p. 261), he was—after being several times rendered supremely ridiculous by Palmerston's love of practical joking—snuffed out very unceremoniously. He begged hard to stay in, even at the curtailment of his salary "of a few hundreds." Out he went, however, and to this day believes himself a martyr to his patriotic desire to link his native country and his adopted one by a firm alliance.

In the narrative of which the points we stated may be taken as the pith, there is a great deal of good, bad and indifferent material, but all written with considerable freshness and vigor. Not the least interesting portions of the book are those taken up with the author's French experiences. We get glimpses of many notable and able men, whose characters or peculiarities are hit off with striking ability. From these we might pick out some pleasant figures and groups if our space permitted. Next to himself the author thinks Louis Napoleon a very remarkable man.

One word in conclusion.

Whether fact or fiction, and many times during its perusal a reader will pause to question if these adventures do not come under the latter head, the book will command an eager sale, though we doubt if it will draw Lord Palmerston or any of his officials from their silence. Future ages, we fear, will be unable to learn if Palmerston, or his successor Clarendon, was really in dread of Wikoff, or whether Wikoff ever did anything, save from some unaccountable reason woo, and not win, a lady by the name of Gamble.

A. Oakey Hall, Esq., at present District Attorney of our city, and well known as a gentleman of creditable literary taste and performance, gives us a Holiday story entitled Old Whitey's Christmas Trot. The scene is laid in the city, and there are several characters which well sustain the design of the book in being meant for the hearty and natural phase of our yearly existence which next week shall usher in. The story takes its name from a horse belonging to a clergyman who is persecuted by a pair of Wall street lawyers. The taking of the horse on execution, initiates the romance of real life, which happily and of course ends, as it should for Christmas time, with reconciliation, pleasant discovery, marriage and happiness. The book is a little quarto, published by the Harpers, and illustrated with sixteen very clever and characteristic sketches by Thwaites. In a pleasantly reminiscent "preliminary trot," the author delicately hints that were his book "more than a holiday trifle" he should feel as if there ought to be a dedication to his father's comrade and his own early friend, George P. Morris. The style of Old Whitey is somewhat after the manner—vivacious, facile and sketchy—of Mr. Hall's Manhattaner in New Orleans, published about five years ago.

A very suitable present for such as desire to ingratiate themselves with, and extend a more than temporary benefit to, the younger members of the domestic circle, is the collection of elegant little volumes, published by Redfield and entitled, Dickens' Little Folks. It is needless to criticise the lives and times of those young heroes of the novelist. Some are natural, some supernatural, but all are worth knowing, more or less. The series before us embraces the following circle of characters, described in the exact words of the author of their beings:—The Boy Joe and Sam Weller; Sissy Jupe; the Two Daughters; Tiny Tim and Dot, and the Fairy Cricket; Dame Durden; and Dolly Varden, the Little Coquette. Each volume contains a fine illustration.

History of Henry the Fourth, King of France and Navarre, By John C. S. Abbott, is a reproduction—in handsome book shape, uniform with Abbott's series of histories—of the article in the November number of Harpers' Magazine, to the interesting nature of which we have before alluded. In addition to the illustrations, there is a handsome illuminated title-page. (Harper & Brother.)

The Edinburgh Review for October, in an article on "New Poets," comes slashingly down on Alexander Smith's "Life Drama," and desires "Festus" Bailey to know and understand that although his admirers believe he has written "poetry enough to have set up a dozen minor poets, yet he is no more than such a poet himself."

The eleventh part of Gentillucci's Life of the Blessed Virgin is at hand. The typography of the work is very fine, and the engraving in the present number—after VanDyke's Crucifixion—is worth the price of half a volume. (Dunigan & Brother.)

Science vs. Spiritualism; or, a Treatise on Turning Tables. Translated from the French of Count de Gasperin, by E. W. Roberts, has just been published in New-York. It is an important work, and we regret that we did not receive it in time to do full justice to it this week. He assumes that the phenomenon of Turning Tables is real, neither trickery nor jugglery, but that it can be demonstrated to be of purely physical nature, quite repudiating the spirits. He examines the Supernatural in general, touching upon the various sorceries and superstitions that have obtained from time to time, giving natural explanations of the pretended supernatural. Gasperin argues that animal magnetism is not the motive power of the Turning Tables, but some other and less known law of Nature; and as thousands have seen this new wonder in their own houses, it is fortunate that the matter has found such an able expounder and has been brought before the American public in a clear and candid manner.

Dr. Braun, secretary of the Archæological Society of Rome, died there the other day, as likewise did Luigi Canini, President of the Museum of the Capitol.

Literary and Artistic News.

Mr. Herman E. Ludewig, a well-known German lawyer of this city, died on the 12th at his residence in Brooklyn, after a short illness, aged 47. Mr. L. came to this country about fifteen years ago, intending merely a temporary visit; but, in consequence of some private letters—touching on politics—which he wrote home, his friends him advised to remain. He pursued the legal profession with, we learn, considerable success. He was one of the most active members of the American Ethnological Society, and was also connected with the National Institute and New-York Historical Society. He was the author of a very valuable bibliographical work, the only one of its kind, entitled Literature of American Local History, New-York, 1846. A new production, a bibliographical list of Grammars, Dictionaries, &c., of the languages of the American Continent, is now in the press of Tubner in London. He leaves a widow.

The Dublin Evening Post notices a work of extraordinary interest, which just now excites the admiration of the learned, and which, probably, will be an object of curiosity to virtuosi for generations to come. It is an illustrated copy of Horace, not illustrated in the ordinary acceptation of the word as applied to publications, but illustrated, through the indefatigable zeal, refined taste, and unsparing outlay of the owner, with several thousands of engravings, collected throughout Europe, and comprising all that could be found worthy of a place in such a collection, and that might illustrate the scenes, characters, or subjects of the works of the great Roman poet in question—all these being now bound up with a copy of Horace, and forming with it four enormous folios. The pages of the letter-press, which is a large quarto, have been inlaid with extraordinary care and skill in leaves of a super-royal folio, and each leaf of the poetry is followed by a number of engravings applicable to it, and carefully attached to leaves of the same size. The prints, as far as the writer had an opportunity of examining them, all possessed some superior merit or interest, many of them being works of much rarity and value. The number of the prints cannot be less than four or five thousand, not counting separately the small ones, of which there are several on a page; and a great many of them could only have been procured at the sacrifice of valuable works of which they form part. The owner and collector of this unique and priceless Horace, is Robert Tighe, Esq., Chairman of the County of Limerick, whose knowledge in matters of art and literature is well known, and to whose taste this Horatian museum, as it might well be called, does infinite credit. If his favorite author could recross the Stygian stream to see his monument, raised after so many ages to his genius, he might well be proud of the tribute paid to him by the Irish Mæcenas. The work is bound in four volumes, in whole Russia, gorgeously gilt, and altogether in a grand and massive style, worthy of the unparalleled contents.

At the late meeting of the Cork Scientific and Literary Society, Dr. Porter announced a fact, which will be now for the first time learned by the world at large, that the author of the Law for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, was Mr. Walter James Baldwin, of Macroom, brother of Dr. Baldwin, formerly member for Cork for a short time. In the neighborhood of Macroom, Mr. Baldwin is still famous for a duel which he fought with an officer, and in which he shot his antagonist. The misunderstanding is said to have arisen out of the party or sectarian dissensions which raged towards the close of the last, and far into the present century. The shooting of a "Protestant" officer was considered a great "Catholic" victory. Mr. Baldwin soon after this event went to London, where he passed the remainder of his life. In the duel with the officer, he narrowly escaped death himself, his adversary's ball, it is said, having passed through his mouth, carrying away two of his teeth, and coming out under his ear. The officer was shot in the very part where his cousin's, Daniel O'Connell's shot afterwards proved fatal to D'Esterre.

The London papers announce the death of Mr. David Bogue, the well-known London publisher, and one of the chief proprietors of the Illustrated News. He retired to rest in his usual health and spirits Nov. 18th, and on the following morning, on awaking, complained of a sense of suffocation. He asked for a cup of tea to be given him, and immediately afterwards became speechless, and in less than five minutes had ceased to exist. His enterprise as a publisher was evidenced in the numerous elegant gift-books and the admirable juvenile publications produced under his auspices. Mr. Bogue was formerly in partnership with Mr. Tilt, and on the retirement of the latter gentleman, carried on the business at 86 Fleet-street, by himself. He was about forty years of age, and has left a widow and five young children.

Lord Cardigan, the hero of "the charge at Balaklava," is about to be sued for libel. A Mr. Ryan, author of "The Lives of our Heroes in the Crimea," having been abused by Lord C. in a speech, Mr. R. reaffirms the truth of his positions, gives conversations which took place between the earl and his officers, "after his lordship retreated from the enemy's guns," and declares that he has instructed his solicitor to bring the Earl of Cardigan into court, there to justify. So fun is expected.

The Vienna papers announce that a Danish savant has translated the Runic inscription of the celebrated Piræus lion in Venice. According to the expounder, it announces that Harold Sigardson, half brother of Olaf, the Saint, one of the Viking pirates, in the year 1040, being called to the help of the Greek Emperor, with the aid of his Norman suite, conquered the Piræus, and levied tribute from the people.

Monsieur Pauter, of Geneva, has just published a book, entitled "Remarques sur le Dictionnaire de l'Academie Francaise," in which he has exposed the numerous mistakes which are to be found in that celebrated authority. M. Pautier's work, which must have cost him immense labor and research, will become an absolutely necessary supplement to the French dictionary.

The first daily newspaper printed in Virginia, was in 1780, and the subscription price was $50 per anaum. The daily paper of that date was not so large as a sheet of common foolscap, and a dozen of them contained about as much reading-matter as one finds in a two cent daily of our day.

Eugene Sue, the distinguished French novelist, has written to a friend in New-York, that the last of his series, sixteen in number, of novels on "The Mysteries of the People," is approaching completion. It will be comprised in two volumes. The author thinks it will be his masterpiece.

The grandfather of William H. Prescott, the historian, commanded the American forces at Bunker Hill, while the grandfather of his wife commanded a British ship-of war, which bombarded the American works in the same action. The historian has the swords of each, at his residence in Boston.

LOCAL CHANGES AND LOCAL FACTS

OF OLD NEW-YORK.

BY JOHN F. WATSON,

Author of the Annals of Philadelphia.

NO. II.

Then Mr. Ebbets saw no commerce, nor vessels along the North River side. The Albany sloops all went round to East River, and all their sailors talked Dutch, and all understood it enough for their business.

He was familiar with the plot of the old fort, and described it thus:—first, the green bank, which was sloping, was about fourteen feet high, on which was erected a wall of about twenty feet additional height. An old linden and two apple trees on the city side, were as high as the walls. Some barracks lay along the line of State street.

The Broadway, in 1772, extended only as high as the Hospital. Where the Hospital is was Rutger's Orchard.

There was a rope-walk (Vanpelt's) a little north of Courtland street, running from Broadway to the North River. All the old deeds on the north side of Courtland street, speak of fifteen feet of the said walk as in their lots. Another ran parallel to it from opposite the present Bridewell prison; and in its place, or near it, was formerly a range of British barracks; [as I think since, in the line of the present Scudder's Museum.]

The "brick meeting," built in 1764, on Beekman street, near Chatham street, was then said to be, in popular parlance, in "the fields." There Whitfield to preached.

Back of the above-mentioned barracks, and also behind the present jail, was a high hill, and on its descent a Negro burying-ground; and thence further down it was a fine meadow.

The British army gave the name of "the Mall" to their parade-ground fronting the Trinity church.

There were very fine Sun fish and Roach fish caught in the Collect Pond.

The City Hall, at the head of Broad street, (afterwards the Congress Hall) besides holding the courts was also a prison. In front of it, on the head of Broad street, he remembered seeing a whipping-post, and pillory and stocks. He had seen them lead the culprits round the town, whipping them at the cart-tail They also introduced the wooden horse as a punishment. The horse was put into the cart-body, and the criminal set thereon. Mary Price having been the first who had the infamous distinction, caused the horse to be ever after called "the horse of Mary Price."

So recently has a part of Water street been filled up, that he could now lead to the spot there, where could be found the body of a vessel deep under the present ground.

He verified the fact in Moulton's book, of a canal (or channel) of water running out of the present Beaver street, into the Broad street canal in primitive times. He said that half way between Broad street and New street, in Beaver street, there had been dug up two bars of lead, evidently dropped overboard from some boat. At same place was a cedar post, upright, having on it the lines of the ropes of boats once tied to it.

The Mineral Spring, No. 8 Jacob's street, quaintly enough called Jacob's Well, is a real curiosity, whether regarded either as an illusion or as a reality. The enterprise was bold to bore there one hundred and thirty feet, and the result is said to be that they found a spring. having the properties of the Saratoga and Congress waters. Some distrust it, but the proprietors say twenty-five thousand persons used it last year. It is a part of Beekman's swamp.

The house in Peck's Slip, north side, a yellow frame, No. 7, was pointed out to me by an aged person, as being in his youth the nearest house to the river, which was then so near that he could jump into the river then ranging along Water street, near to it. He said also that Walton House, close by on Pearl street, No. 324, had its garden in its rear quite down to the river. He said the hill called Peck's Hill, from Walton House to the Franklin Bank, at the union of Cherry and Pearl streets) was originally a much higher hill.

I went out to the Dry Dock and Steam Mill for sawing, &c., on the river margin of Stuyvesant's Swamp, or flats. It is a very wide extended wet flat, over which tides used to flow, now sluiced out. Some low grass meadows appear; but generally it is a waste, coming now into incalculable value to that family as building lots.

The adjacent hills furnish abundance of coarse sand and gravel material for filling up. At the point or hook, a little beyond the Dry Dock, I saw a small mount, on which, in the revolution, was a small redoubt, near which lay the King Fisher sloop of war.

I observed great digging down of hills and removals of earth going on, all about the Stuyvesant Mansion house and farm. Mr. Nicholas S—— told me they often came to Indian graves, known as such by having oyster shells interred with the bones and sometimes some fragments of frail pottery.

Just beyond "Peter's Field" and mansion, extending up to the Fever Hospital at Bellevue, is a great bend or bay, which is now all filling up with innumerable loads of earth from the adjacent high grounds; the whole having a long wharf in front, calculated to extend down to the Dry Dock, all of which is to be laid out in streets and city lots. It is an immense and spirited undertaking, affording constant business for the laboring poor.

Canal street is a grand undertaking, effecting a great benefit, by draining through a great sewer the waters which once passed by the former to the Collect. The street is broad and the houses genteel; but as this region of ground was once swampy, it is liable now to have wet or damp cellars throughout the range of Lispenard's Swamp to the northward, and from Lafayette theatre, (which is laid on piles) down to the North River. Chapel street, which runs southward from Canal street, follows the line of a former water-course (connecting with the canal formerly and now by a sewer) quite down to Leonard street, and has been all made ground, filled-in over the sewer.

From the inlets to those sewers is emmitted a strong offensive smell of filth and salt water, only, however, perceptible at the apertures, and never known to have any deleterious effect on health.

Mr. Wilke, President of the Bank, told me he once stood sentinel as a volunteer on the sand beach, close to the present old sugar house still standing nearly in the rear of the present City Hotel, on Broadway. Thus proving what I had before heard from Mr. Swords and others, that at the rear of Trinity churchyard, a little beyond where Lumber street is now, the boys used to swim.

Mr. Wilke also told me he knew the parties who, in 1780 fought a duel in the rear of the hospital ground.

In visiting Thomas Rammey, a good chronicle, I learned from himself and wife, several facts, to wit:—

Rammey had lived in Cross street; while there, he dug up remains of the old Magazine, and he could see evidence that water sometimes had enclosed it, (as Lyne's ancient map had shown.) His mother-in-law, if alive, would be one hundred and six years of age. She often talked of the block houses and palisades behind present City Hall; said the Indians occupied many places outside of their line, and used there to make baskets, ladles, &c., for sale. Many of them hutted outside the present Hospital towards the North River.

She well remembered they were used at times, in high waters, to have a ferry boat to take across the people in Chatham street, over where it crosses Pearl street which is still marked low ground. Lyne's map of 1729 marks this same place with a bridge.

She had a recollection of the wife of Governor Stuvesant, and used to go out to his farm near the flats, and there see numerous fish caught.

She remembered and spoke much of the Negro Plot—said it made terrible agitation—saw the Negroes hung back of the site of the present jail, in the Park. A wind-mill once stood near there.

The Jews' burying-ground was up Chatham street, on a hill, where is now the Tradesman's Bank.

She said the water once run from the Collect both ways; i.e. to the East River as well as to the North River. Sometimes the salt water came up to it from the North River in the winters, and raised the ice.

In her time the strand or beach on the East River was along present Pearl street generally; and at the corner of Pearl street and Maiden Lane, ther dwelt her brother-in-law, who used to keep his boat tied to his stoop to ferry him off by water.

She said Maiden lane got its name from the practice of women, the younger part, generally going out there to bleach their family linen: all of which was then made at home. It had a fine creek or brook, and was headed by a good spring. Some time afterwards, minor springs remained for a time in cellars there, and one was in Cuyler's house till modern times. The hills adjacent, clothed in fine grass, sloped gradually to the line Maiden lane, and there she bleached with many others.

She said that Broadway went no higher than St. Paul's Church.

She said "Chapel Hill," where is now Dr. Milnor's church, on Beekman street, was a very high mount and steep, from which the boys with sleds used to slide down on the snow, quite to the swamp below. With this agrees the fact told me by Mr. James Bogert, that his father, in latter times, used to ride up to it as a high apple orchard.

Mr. Rammey said, that behind the City Hall once stood an Alms house, built in 1710, and taken down about the year 1793; perhaps the burials behind it gave rise to the remark made to me by Dr. Francis, that along the line of Chambers street are many graves.

He says he used to be told that the real 'ferry-house' on Broad street, was on the north-east corner of Garden street, now Exchange place, and is lately taken down (and so others have also suggested to me); and that the other (No. 19), a little higher up (the north end of the Custom house store) was only a second inn, having a ferry boat sign, either in opposition, or to perpetuate the other. He said the boats were flat-bottomed, and used to come from Jersey. To me I confess it seems to have been a singular location for a ferry, but as the tradition is so singular and concurrent, I incline to think it was so called from its being a resort of country boats coming there to find a central place for their sales. I have heard the names of certain present rich families, whose ancestors were said to come there with oysters.

A man actually born in the old ferry house, at the corner, and who dwelt there forty years, described it as a very low one story house, with very high and steep pediment roof; its front on Broad street; its side along Garden alley had two dormer windows in the roof, much above the plate; shingle roof covered with moss; one hundred years probably of age; and an iron boat, and oars, and anchor for a sign; the "Governor's house" adjoined it in the alley. An old lady close by confirmed all this.

Mr. David Grim, an aged citizen to whom we are indebted for much valuable data given to the Historical Society, has estimated in detail the houses of the city in 1744, to have been 1141 in number, of which only 129 houses were on the west side of the Broadway to the North River inclusive; thus evidencing fully that the tide of population very greatly inclined to the East River.

Mrs. Myers, the daughter of said D. Grim, said she had seen the British barracks of wood, enclosed by a high fence. It extended from Broadway to Chatham-street, along poesent Chambers-street, exactly where is now the Museum. It had a gate at each end; the one by Chatham-street, was called "Tryon's Gate," after the name of the governor, from which we have derived since there, the name of "Tryon's Row."

About the year 1788, the whole of the ancient fort, near the site of the present Battery, was all taken down and levelled under the direction of Messrs. J. Pintard, Vansant, and Janeway, as city commissioners. The design was to prepare the site to erect thereon a house for General Washington, as President of the United States; but as the Congress removed to Philadelphia, he never occupied it, and it therefore became the "governor's house," in the person of Gov. Clinton.

In taking down the ancient Dutch chapel vault, they came to the remains of Lord and Lady Bellermont, in leaden coffins, known by family escutcheon and inscriptions on silver plates. These coffins, with the bones of several others, were taken by Mr. Pintard, who told me, to St. Paul's Church ground, where they all rest now in one common grave, without any notice above ground of "storied urn or animated bust."

The silver plates were taken by Mr. Vansant for a museum, but he dying, they fell into hands which, with much bad taste, converted them into spoons! A story much like this is told of the use made of the coffin plates of Governor Paulus Vanderbrecke and wife, placed first in G. Baker's museum, and afterwards in Tammany Hall. Lord Bellermont died in 1701.

This brief notice of the once renowned dead, so soon divested of sculptured fame, leads me to the notice of some other cases where the sculptor's hand could not give even brief existence to once mighty names. I refer to the king's equestrian statue of lead, in the centre of the Bowling-Green, and to Pitt's marble statue, in Wall-street, centre of William-street. Both are gone, and scarcely may you learn the history of their abduction. So frail is human glory!

The latter I found, after much inquiry and search, in the Arsenal-yard, on the site of the Collect. It had before been to Bridewell-yard. The statue is of fine marble and fine execution, in a Roman toga, and showing the roll of Magna Charta; but it is decapitated, and without hands—in short, a sorry relic! Our patriot fathers of the revolution, when they erected it, swore it should be as eternal, as "enduring as marble." They idolized the man as their British champion,

"In freedom's cause with generous warmth inspired."

But the fact was, while the British army occupied New-York, their champion lost his head on some unknown occasion, and has never since been heard of! The statue itself was taken down soon after the peace, both as an inconvenience in the street, so narrow there in the busy mart, and also as a deformity. Alexander M'Cormick, Esq., who dwelt near the statue, told me it disappeared the night of St. Andrew, when, as it was whispered, some British officers, who had been at their revels, struck it off in revelry rather than in spite. No inquisition was made for it at the time; one hand had before been struck off, it was supposed, by boys. A story was told among some Whigs, that the Tories had struck off the head in retaliation for the alleged insult offered to the king, by drawing his statue along the street to melt it into bullets for the war. My friend, John Baylie, was present in April, '76, and saw the degrading spectacle. He saw no decent people present; a great majority were shouting boys. The insult, if so meant, was to the dead, as the statue was of George II., our most gracious king!"

"Then boast not honors. Sculpture can bestow Short-lived renown!"

[Querie: should not the Society of Artists possess and repair such a piece of art as Pitt's statue?]

Before the revolution, and even some time afterwards, William street was the great mart for dry good sales, and chiefly from Maiden-lane up to Pearl-street. It was the proper Bond-street, too, for the beaux and shopping belles. Now Broadway has its turn.

Pearl street then had no stores, but it was the place of good dwellings; then Broadway had no stores or business, and had but a few scattered houses about the region of the new City Hall.

Before the revolution, the only road out of town was by the Bowery road, and was once called "the high road to Boston."

The Bowling Green was before called "the Parade."

Mr. Thomas Swords, aged sixty-six, told me he remembered to have seen the remains of an old redoubt by Grace and Lumber street (corner), the same which was presumed once to have terminated the northern line of the city along Wall-street. It was a hill there; then American prisoners were buried in time of the revolution; and he has seen coffins there in the wasting banks of the mount; at the foot of it, was the beach along the North River.

The grand-father of Mr. James Bogert told him that oyster vessels used to come up Broad-street to sell them; and in later times, water used to enter cellars along that street from the canal.

NEW MUSIC FOR PARLOR AND SCHOOL.

THE

Musical Bouquet, or Institute Choir.

A New and Tasteful Collection of Songs, Duets, Trios, and Chorusses, with a complete and perspicuous Course of Elementary Instruction, designed for the Social Circle and the Schoolroom.

By William B. Bradbury and Charles C. Converse.

Price....63cts.

This beaufiful work contains a much higher grade of Music than the ordinary collections of the kind. Most of the pieces are new, and are particularly rich in melody and chaste in arrangement. The accompanying words are also generally elevated, pure, and replete with the spirit of poetry. Mr. Bradbury's reputation as a composer will be a sufficient guarantee of the originality, grace, and animation of his part of the work; and in Mr. Converse the musical public will not fail to discern the indications of genius.

The Knickerbocker Magazine says:

"We have here something new, and something fair to the eye. In three points this work may challenge successful competition—first, in the character of its melodies; secondly, the beauty and tenderness of the words, with some exceptions; and finally in mechanical execution."

The Churchman characterizes it as "A capital assortment of songs, duets, trios, and choruses, including most of the popular productions of the day."

The Boston Journal commends its new music as "very pretty and well arranged."

Price 63 cts. Sent post-paid on receipt of the price.

Copies sent to teachers at half price for examination, with a view to its use in classes.

Electro-Magnetic Baths.—The Electro-Magnetic Baths having become permanently established as a remedial agent for the cure of Inflammatory and Chronic Rheumatism, Gout, Stiff and Enlarged Joints, Paralysis, Ulcers, Tic Doloreux, Neuralgia, Pain in the Limbs, &c. &c., and for the positive extraction of Mercury and other Mineral Poisons from the human system, the Messrs. Sloan & Co. take this method of informing the public that they have fitted up and opened an establishment at No. 53 Sixth Avenue, where the Baths will be constantly in operation, under the care and direction of Dr. G. H. Doyle, Homeopathic Professor of Medicine. To those unacquainted with "Electro-Magnetism" as applied to the cure of disease, reduction and extraction of mineral poisons, &c., we would say that as a means of cure for the above enumerated diseases, it has received the almost universal endorsement of the various Academies of Medicine throughout Europe and the United States, and that the reduction of Metals by a Voltaic Current, is no new science: it is the APPLICATION of the FACT to its extraction from the system for which we claim originality. In it we dismiss all theories—we leave nothing to chance—we are not led by blind experience, but we follow unerring and never failing principles.

Thousands who are now suffering from what they imagine to be Rheumatic Pains in the Joints, Bones, &c., are in fact suffering from the injurious exhibition of mineral poisons taken probably many years previously. To such we are positive in our promise of a permanent and speedy cure. Females laboring under complaints incidental to their sex, will find in this remedy a means of relief at once pleasant and satisfactory. A competent lady in constant attendance for their special accommodation.

Persons afflicted in any way with sickness, debility, &c. will do well to call at the office, examine the Baths, and receive full explanation of the treatment pursued. SLOAN & CO., 53 Sixth Avenue,
Between Fourth-street and West Washington Place.

Genin's Festival Hat.—Determined to grace the holidays with the most aristocratic and highly finished specimen of an American Hat that has yet appeared in the fashionable circles of New-York, Genin has produced for the present season a dress fabric of surpassing beauty, equally adapted to the promenade and the drawing-room visit, and distinguished not alone for beauty of shape, fineness of texture and superior finish, but for the taste displayed in every minor detail which contributes to the general effect.

The model of Genin's Festival Hat is the Parisian Court style for the present winter, with a slight alteration; the crown is a little lower than the prevailing fashion, and the proportions more symmetrical.

A slight deviation from this style, somewhat more piquant and juvenile in its ensemble, has also been issued for young men.

Both these elegant fabrics are now ready, and they are issued by the undersigned, with the unqualified assurance that they are the most faultless and becoming dress hats that have ever appeared in this city.

That they will be the ruling styles of the gay season, no one who has seen them, and compared them with the winter issues of other establishments, expresses the slightest doubt. GENIN, 214 Broadway,

Official Notices.

Proclamation! — Mayor's Office, Nov. 10, 1856.—Whereas, on the evening of the 18th of October last, Terrence Frawley, a resident of the City of New-York, while passing through Mott street, opposite or ner number 65 in that street, was stabbed and has since died from the wounds then and there received; and whereas there is good cause to believe that the said Frawley was so stabbed by a man named Dominick O'Donnell, Now, therefore, I, Fernando Wood, Mayor of the City of New-York, by virtue of the authority vested in me, do offer a reward of two hundred and fifty Dollars, for the arrest of the said O'Donnell. Said reward to be paid on his delivery to the keeper of any of the prisons of this city.
no22 FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

Custom House, New-York, Collector's Office, November 1, 1856.—Notice to Importers.—Importers are notified that all goods left in the Appraiser's store, No. 12 Broad street, after being examined by the Appraisers, whether the same have been originally entered for warehouse or not, will be treated as unclaimed goods and sold. The Appraisers' stores are not warehouses, under the warehouse act for the storage of merchandize in bond, and no property can be permitted to remain there after the legal examination has been made. It is the duty of importers to have their goods transferred to some private bonded warehouse, immediately after this examination, or withdraw them if the duty has been paid, and should this be neglected they must incur the risk of having their property transferred to the United States Stores at the Atlantic Dock, and sold as unclaimed.

Daguerreotypes.

Mark the Facts!—J. GURNEY'S establishment, No. 349 Broadway, corner of Leonard street, is the oldest and most extensive in the United States. GURNEY was the first to introduce the Art of Photography in this city. GURNEY has recently made important alterations and improvements in his establishment. GURNEY has now greater facilities for producing finer work in every branch than has heretofore been produced in this country. GURNEY has still in his employ the best of his old artists. GURNEY has recently added to the above a talented corps of American, French, and German artists. GURNEY'S colored Photographs of all sizes need only to be seen to be appreciated; they speak for themselves. GURNEY'S plain, unretouched Photographs were never equaled—so say artists and the best judges. GURNEY'S Daguerreotypes are universally pronounced superior productions. GURNEY has received more testimonials for his skill than any other artist in the profession. GURNEY received the only medal for Photographic productions at the late Paris Exposition—consequently, GURNEY stands at the head of the world in the Photographic Art. GURNEY has not removed any branch of his business to any part of the city. GURNEY has no connection with any other establishment in any part of the city. GURNEY attends personally to his patrons and friends, and has done so for the last sixteen years. GURNEY will be most happy to continue that attention, and will still endeavor to please all who may favor him with a visit to his Photographic Palace of Art.

FACTS

THAT NEED NO MARKING.

Progression.

From Humphrey's Photographic Journal of Sept. 1856.

We do not approve of the plan of puffiing the members of the Photographic profession by way of personals. This may do very well when one is trying to bring his works into favor with such as are susceptible to flattery, and measure out their support according to the amount of editorial ink used as bait. We feel confident that those who best know will agree with us as that it is no puffing, when we can say with so much truth, that the Photographic Art this day owes, in no small degree, its position in this country to Mr. C. D. FREDRICKS, a gentleman who was the first to introduce the Photographic process upon an extensive scale in America. Previous to his establishing himself here, he visited Europe, and, with an enterprise worthy of imitation, he was not satisfied with first securing what knowledge he could himself gain, but also engaged the services of several of the most eminent Parisian Artists. He then, in connection with Mr. GURNEY, opened an establishment on a plan unequaled in the world.

After successfully following his profession, in connection with Mr. G., for some time, he has opened a "Temple of Art" in this City, under his own professorship and supervision. We have honestly and candidly presented the foregoing, feeling that is justly due to a fellow-laborer.

CHARLES D. FREDRICKS, late GURNEY & FREDRICKS, Photographs, Daguerreotypes, Ambrotypes, &c., No. 585 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel.

FACTS WHICH ARE KNOWN.—PHOTOGRAPHS DAGUERREOTYPES, AMBROTYPES, &c.—The undersigned having removed the Photograph department and his Parisian artists from his old place of business, No. 349 Broadway, to his new and magnificent establishment, No. 585 Broadway, would call the attention of public to the fact that his Galleries, and the pictures made in them, are superior to anything before exhiited. Those desiring Photograps, Daguerreotypes, or Ambrotypes, executed by artists of refined taste, would do well to call and judge for themselves. Reception Rooms on the first floor, and are open from 8 A. M., to 10 P. M.

Brady's Photographic Palace of Art.—Who would not desire to possess a memento, so perfect and life-like of a dead relative or friend, as can be furnished by the photographic art? What more acceptable present can be given or received than one of Brady's splendid, almost speaking portraits, which reflect the expression as well as the features of their originals? Those who desire beautiful portraits of the members of their family, should take care to have them in the highest style of art. Strangers visiting this city, will find no spot more interesting than BRADY'S DAGUERRIAN GALLERY AND PALACE OF PHOTOGRAPHIC ART, No. 205 Broadway.

TO THE PUBLIC!

Consumption---Watkinson's Pulmonacia.

A SAFE, reliable family medicine, warranted not to contain a particle of mercury or any other mineral poison; not a nine day's wonder got up to sell and humbug the public. He has used it for years in private families of friends, and now, at the urgent request of hundreds who have seen its remarkable cures, where every other remedy has failed, he offers it to the public to benefit and relieve those suffering with that fatal disease, so inherent to our changeable climate, carrying off its thousands to an early grave—Consumption. It has effected some of the most remarkable cures ever heard of; how some dear friend was saved from death, when all hope was given up, now lives and enjoys good health. Its rare qualities are not only in relieving consumptive patients, but for all diseases of the lungs, racking nervous cough, night sweats, bronchial affections of the throat, internal inflammation, where the blood is impure, it has no equal. The discoverer of PULMONACIA is RICHARD WATKINSON, a gentleman of well-known standing in Philadelphia and New-York. Those that are acquainted with him know there is no quackery or humbug about it, as the number of certificates that can be obtained at the office will satisfy the most incredulous as to its value.

LITTELL, SON & CO., BOSTON.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

THIS work is made up of the elaborate and stately essays of the EDINBURGH, QUARTERLY, and other Reviews; and BLACKWOOD' noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen Political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History and Common Life, by the sagacious SPECTATOR, the sparkling EXAMINER, the judicious, ATHENEUM, the busy and industrious LITERARY GAZETTE, the sensible and comprehensive BRITANNIA, the sober and respectable CHRISTIAN OBSERVER; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the UNITED SERVICE, and with the best articles of the DUBLIN UNIVERSITY, NEW MONTHLY, FRASER'S, TAIT'S, AINSWORTH'S, HOOD'S and SPORTING MAGAZINES, and of Chambers' admirable JOURNAL. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from PUNCH; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of THE TIMES. We shall increase our variety by importations from the Continent of Europe, and from the growth of the British Colonies.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday—price, (free of postage) six dollars a year. Remittances for any period will be promptly attended to.

Complete sets of the FIRST SERIES, in thirty-six volumes, handsomely bouud, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principle cities, free of expense of freight, are for sale for Seventy-two Dollars. The Second Series began in 1853.

Any volume may be had separately, at Two Dollars, bound, or a Dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents—and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

☞ A few advertisements of Books, Patents, or other matters of general interest, will be added, at reasonable rates.

Extracts of Letters from Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, and President Adams.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I have read the prospectus with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give healthy tone, not only to our literature but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character.

JOSEPH STORY.

NEW-YORK, May 7, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of the "Living Age;" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates (of which I have no reason to doubt), it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day.

JAMES KENT.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe, and in this country, this has appeared to me the most useful. It contains, indeed, the exposition only of the current literature of the English language; but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind, in the utmost expansion of the present age.

J. Q. ADAMS.

THE PANORAMA OF LIFE AND LITERATURE.

Published Monthly at the Office of Littell's Living Age,

Boston.

Every number of this work contains articles of leading interest; grave and earnest, yet not heavy; popular, and yet of abiding value. To these are added, in profuse abundance and great variety, Tales, Poetry, Voyages, Travels, and whatever—within the bounds of sound taste and good principles—may be included under the large head of Light Reading. But mere light reading soon becomes wearisome, unless there breathe from it spirit and heart, life and soul.

We promise a Magazine that shall be more and better than mere amusement: a Book suited to the leisure of the old and wise, and yet abundantly attractive to the young and ardent. It will freely provide for the Imagination, as well as for the Reaaon and Memory.

For THREE DOLLARS A YEAR, received at the office of publication, the Panorama will be sent (free of postage), to any post-office in the United States.

Two COPIES, Five Dollars a year; FIVE COPIES, Ten Dollars a year, Clubs to pay their own postage, which is three cents a number, payable QUARTERLY IN ADVANCE.

The first number was issued in July, 1855. It makes two large volumes a year. We can supply orders for back numbers or volumes.

Both Works are Published by Littell, Son & Company, Boston. oct18 tf

☞ Post Office Notice.—The Mails for Europe, via Southampton and Bremen, per U. S. Steamer Arago, will close at this office on SATURDAY, the 13th day of December, at 10½ o'clock, A. M.

ELIZABETHAN ALE.

MEDICAL men now very generally recommend the occasional use of pure ale to those who are in need of nourishment ; and it is undoubtedly the most wholesome beverage for general use that can be found. This is not a new idea. In Queen Elizabeth's time our ancestors universally consumed it—from Elizabeth herself, in her palace, to the farmer in the field. In those days, adulterated wines and fiery liquors may be said to have been unknown, and very heavy penalties were enacted against using anything except malt and hops in brewing. It is not at all extravagant to assert, that the average duration of the life of a large portion of our race is a third less than it was two or three huudred years ago, and this is chiefly attributable to what we eat and what we drink. Even now the heartiest people that can be found are from the rural districts of England, who yet follow the old fashioned diet.

All who use ale, whether as a beverage or for the purpose of nourishment, will find the Elizabethan Ale most excellent. Being made on the Scotch plan, it is as pure and wholesome, (if not equal in flavor) as the imported, while its cost is but little more than a common article. Families and retailers supplied at 120 WATER STREET, one door above Wall. oc4m8

TWO LARGE EDITIONS IN THREE MONTHS!!!

JUST PUBLISHED, PRICE $1 50. The Second Edition, revised and corrected,

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.

Pages of its History—By Henry de Courcy, Author of "Le Servantes de Canada."

Translated and concluded by John Gilmary Shea.

Possessing great industry and rare talent for historical narration, combined with true Catholic feeling and a sincere love of Truth, Mr. De Courcy has grouped together the most important facts in the history of the Church in Maryland, Virginia, and the Middle States, with a general view of the progress of Catholicity in the country.

Among the important matters embraced in the volume are,

I. Sketches of Archbishops Carroll, Neale, Marechal, Whitfield, Eccleston, Kenrick, and Hughes. Bishops Conwell, Concanen, Connolly, Dubois, Barron, Kelly, Whelan, McGill, O'Connor, Neumann, Young, Bayley, McCloskey, Timon, Loughlin, Prince Gallitzin, Father Malou. Rev. Messrs. Nagot, Joubert, Power, Kohlmann, Chevalier Keating, &c.

II. Religious Orders of many—the only account in English: The Jesuits, Sulpitians, Redemptorists, Brothers of the Christian Schools, The Sisters of Charity and Mother Seton, The Visitation Nuns and Miss Lalor, The Sisters of Providence and the Rev. THE NEW-YORK AND LIVERPOOL

United States Mail Line.

The ships composing this line are the following:

The ATLANTIC .....Capt. Eldridge.
The ADRIATIC .....Capt. West.
The PACIFIC .....Capt. Eldridge.
The BALTIC .....Capt. Comstock.

These ships have been built by contract, expressly for the government service. Every care has been taken in their construction, as also in their engines to insure strength and speed; and their accommodations for passengers are unequalled for elegance and comfort.

Price of passage from New-York to Liverpool in first cabin, $130; in second do., $75. Exclusive use of extra size state rooms, $325. From Liverpool to New-York, 30 and 20 guineas.

An experienced surgeon attached to each ship.

No berth can be secured until paid for.

WILLIAMS & GUION'S

Old Black Star Line of Packets. 1856.

Passage from any part of Great Britain and Ireland, secured at the lowest possible rates by this old-established line, sailing from Liverpool to New-York every five days, comprising the following magnificent Ships:

Ships.	Captains.	Tonage.
AUSTRALIA,	Smith,	2,000
BRIDGEWATER (new),	Barstow,	2,000
CULTIVATOR (new),	Austin,	2,000
CYNOSURE,	Bray,	2,000

THORNTON (new),	Collins,	2,000
TICONDEROGA,	Boyle,	1,400
UNIVERSE,	Cave,	2,000
VANGUARD,	Norton,	1,800

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of the departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; or persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

NOTICE.—The recent failures, by which a large amount of Bills remitted from this country to friends in Ireland, has been returned unpaid, afford to this Society the opportunity, and at the same time impose upon it the duty of informing the public, that such losses would have been prevented if the parties purchasing Bills had availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Society.

For the purpose of entire protection a fund is constantly kept on deposit in the Bank of Ireland, against which this Society issues its drafts, payable at sight (from sums of £1 sterling and upwards), on the Bank and all its branches, and has thereby for the last Ten Years afforded a mode of remittance perfectly safe and unquestionable.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, New-York, Aug. 13, 1856.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That the following ordinance, relative to express wagons, carts, cartmen, &c., &c., having been adopted, its provisions will hereafter be enforced.

FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

AN ORDINANCE

To amend an Ordinanae entitled "An Ordinance for the licensing, and otherwise regulating the use and employment of express wagons, carts and cartmen, &c., &c., approved by the Mayor June 2, 1851."

The Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New-York, in Common Council convened, do ordain as follows:

That section 2 of said Ordinance, relating to carts and cartmen, be amended, so as to read as follows:

SECTION 2. The Mayor shall from time to time license and appoint so many and such persons as he may think proper, to set up and keep public carts in said city, Provided, that no one person shall be so licensed to keep more than three such public carts.

And he shall also license so many and such persons as he may think proper, to be public cartmen of said city, and he may revoke or suspend any or all such licenses at his pleasure. All persons licensed as foresaid, to keep public carts, shall be deemed to be public cartmen, within the meaning of this Ordinance; but it shall not be lawful for any person to receive or to hold a license to keep public carts, or to be a public cartman, unless he be a citizen of the United States, and resident within the State of New-York, and is the actual owner of the cart or carts, with good horses therefor, so licensed to be kept as public carts; and the Mayor may examine, under oath, all persons applying for or holding any such license, or the renewal thereof, touching their qualifications as aforesaid, and all licences other than to persons so qualified shall be void.

Adopted by the Board of Councilmen, May 9, 1856.
Adopted by the Board of Aldermen, July 15, 1856.
Approved by the Mayor July 30, 1856.

European News.

The steamship City of Baltimore, from Liverpool to Philadelphia, brings European news to the 3d inst., which, however, is neither politically nor commercially important.

It was rumored that England had at length agreed with the other Powers to re-assemble the Conference of Paris, and it is said that the Congress will shortly meet at Paris.

There were rumors of disunion in the English ministry.

Geo. B. Matthew, ex-Consul at Philadelphia, who was dismissed for his complicity in the enlistment business, has been appointed Consul at Odessa.

Cotton is reported steady.

Breadstuffs had not materially changed.

The papers announce the sudden death of Dr. Hussey, Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford.

There is no French news of importance.

The Madrid correspondence of the Independence Belge says that the question of the Cortes is definitely resolved and that Narvaez has yielded to the demands of the Court. The writer anticipates that some concessions will be demanded of Narvaez, which he will make, and then he will fall. The writer also predicts that before six months are over, Spain will be the scene of a bloody revolution, if the Court should persist in its present retrograde course.

Mr. Myers has taken the Spanish government loan.

The London Post says that if Russia persists in asking for a Conference it can only result in her confusion and diplomatic defeat, for England, Austria, Sardinia and Turkey, and, we doubt not, also our ally, France, will be prepared to maintain the absolute spirit and meaning, and the very text and letter of the treaty drawn up by an able French diplomatist, and signed with the pen and the quill of the Jardin des Plants. Of the ultimate result we have no fear, though a second conference had the power of altering the text or meaning of the treaty of Paris of March 30—but we maintain that a second conference has no such power, and that a resident Minister cannot vary or alter the general act of a Congress called together for the purpose of making a peace on conditions and terms already discussed, deliberately signed, solemnly ratified, and the terms acceded to and carried into effect by every country except Russia.

The King or Prussia made a speech on the opening of the Chambers, in which he uses the strongest language in relation to enforcing his claims on Neufchatel.

The Marquis of Antonini, late ambassador at Paris, has been summoned to Naples by the King.

The Prussian Minister has received orders to suspend all communications with the Swiss government, and to quit Berne.

The Swiss Federal Council had decided to decline the suggestion of the Emperor Napoleon for the liberation of the Neufchatel prisoners.

The expedition against Persia has failed.

Information has been received in official quarters that an insurrectionary movement broke out on the 22d ult., at several points of the province of Palermo. The government officials had been driven away at every point. A number of the ex-deputies of the Sicilian Parliament of 1848 were at the head of the movement. Troops had been sent against the insurgents, and a number of arrests had been made in the capital. At present the precise bearing of the movement is not ascertained.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Within the last twenty-five years all the principal features of the geography of our vast interior regions have been accurately determined, the great fields of Central Asia have been traversed in various directions, from Bokhara and the Oxus to the Chinese Wall; the half-known river system of South America has been explored and surveyed; the icy continent around the Southern Pole has been discovered; the north-western passage, ignus-fatuus of nearly two centuries, is, at last, found; the Dead Sea is stripped of its fabulous terrors; the source of the Niger is no longer a myth, and the sublime secret of the Nile is almost wrested from his keeping. The mountains of the moon, sought for through two thousand years, have been beheld by the Caucasian eye; an English steamer has ascended the Chadda to the frontiers of the great kingdom of Bornou, Leichardt and Stuart have penetrated the wilderness of Australia; the Russians have descended from Irkoutst to the mouth of the Amoor; the antiquated walls of Chinese prejudice have been cracked, and are fast tumbling down; and the canvas screens which surround Japan have been cut by the sharp edge of American enterprise. Such are the principal results of modern exploration. What quarter of a century, since the form of the earth and the boundaries of its land and water were known, can exhibit such a list of achievements.

I am not alone, says a writer in Dicken's Household Words, in my partiality for Irish Moss. There was a time when it was a fashionable dish; and it is still, everywhere in France and Great Britain more or less prescribed as food for invalids. The poor of Brighton use it instead of arrow root. The curly and mamal gristles are bleached like linen and cotton, and when dry will keep for years. An amiable and interesting writer—the late Dr. Landsborough—gives a recipe for cooking it, which is found to be excellent from experience:—"When used, a teacup full of it is boiled in water; this water being strained, is boiled with milk and sugar, and seasoning, such as nutmeg, cinnamon, or essence of lemon. It is then put into a shape in which it consolidates like blancmange, and when eaten with cream it is so good that many a sweet-lipped little girl or boy would almost wish to be on the invalid list to get a share of it."

It may not be generally known that any sum can be multiplied by 25, by simply adding two ciphers to the multiplicand (or sum to be multiplied), and then dividing by four. Take, for example, 68 and multiply it by 25; two ciphers being added make 6,800, which sum being divided by four gives the quotient (or answer)—1700. The reason why the amount is thus obtained is as follows:—two ciphers being added to 68, have exactly the same effect on that sum as if it were multiplied by 100, and the sum thus multiplied being divided by 4, gives the fourth part, or amount due to 25. Any sum may also be multiplied by 75 by the same rule in the following manner:—To the sum to be multiplied—say 68—add two ciphers, which make 6,800; divide by 4, which gives 1,700, or fourth part; and the said 1,700, or fourth part, being substracted from the aforesaid 6,800 leaves the remaining three-fourths or amount due to 75.

Mr. Frederick Percival, son of the late Spencer Percival, writing to the "Press" says:—"Had I a seat in the Legislature, so cordially do I hate all Papists, I would at the beginning of every session place a notice of motion on the votes of Parliament for the repeal of the odious act of 1829, and if the only voter in its favor I would resolutely divide against it. I am a Protestant, and as a Protestant I revere and almost to idolatry adore our most gracious Sovereign; but oh, and absit omen, if she became a Papist, I for one, and I have no doubt I should be followed by millions, nay, tens of millions, of staunch Protestants, would hoist the standard of rebellion against her. As a Protestant I would lay down my life to save hers. Humanly speaking, there is no salvation for this country except a return to the High Church and old Tory principles of my father. Protestant ascendancy should be our motto."

It was generally reported and believed yesterday, says the Court Journal of the 28th ult., that there was a split in the cabinet about the provisions of the new Reform Bill, and that if the majority against the Premier do not give way to his lordship's opinions the ministry will be broken up. We thought there was something in the Globe's volunteered praises upon Lord John Russell a few evenings ago, and that the attempt of the evening Whig organ to galvanise the noble lord out of his present comatose state means more than met the eye.

On the 9th ult. Mr. James Mansfield, expired at the village of Debden, England, in his eighty-second year. He was an extraordinary character, for, though not above the ordinary height, he was of immense magnitude, measuring nine feet round, and weighing thirty-three stone of 14 lb. When sitting on his chair (made especially for his use, four feet wide,) his abdomen covered his knees, and hung down almost to the ground. When he reclined it was necessary to pack his head to prevent suffocation. He could only lie upon one side.

Dr. Cumming, in a letter to the Times, says:—"A paragraph has appeared in most of the newspapers, stating that the Duchess of Athol has been received by Dr. Manning into the Roman Catholic Church. In a more diluted form I read the same statement in several of the Roman Catholic organs also. I have authority for stating that there is no foundation whatever for the report."

It is considered probable that at no distant period the United States may be able to export annually 150 millions of bushels of Indian corn, which would realize about 20 millions sterling, and prove a greater source of wealth than the golden harvest of California.

A series of lectures and amusements for the men during the coming winter have been commenced at Aldershot. The Chaplain-General has given a lecture on "Eminent men who have served in the ranks."

Mr. Albert Smith made his re-appearance on Monday night, at the Egyptian Hall, London. The popular lecturer has made numerous additions to his attractive entertainment of the "Ascent of Mont Blanc."

The Gazette de France says, of England: "Let us draw up the visor of this nation, and expose the trader who wanders about the globe disguised as a knight."

The rumor is again current that the King of Denmark intends abdicating, and is desirous to retire with the Countess Danor to Switzerland.

Silver continues to be sent to England from the Continent to meet the Eastern demand.

The fog was so great in London on Sunday morning the 23rd ult., that the gas had to be lighted.

A treaty of commerce has been concluded between France and the Sandwich Islands.

THE DUEL BETWEEN O'CONNELL AND D'ESTERRE.

One of the few links which connected the past period of political agitation with the present time—so remarkable for the almost total absence of any "movement" of which the development of the industrial resources of the country is not the object—says the Liverpool Journal—has been severed by the demise of Major N'Namara, of Ennistymon-house, in the county of Clare. Nearly 42 years ago, the gallant Major acted as second to Mr. O'Connell, in his memorable and fatal duel with Lieut. D'Esterre, at the time one of the representatives of the guild of merchants in the old, exclusive Corporation of Dublin. Although the Catholic Association, whose organisation and operations were so instrumental in forcing the question of Emancipation upon the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, was not called into existence for some years subsequent to 1815, there yet had been numerous meetings of the Catholics held in Dublin, at which Mr. O'Connell was the principal as well as the most forcible speaker, and in one of his addresses in that year, he referred to the bigotry exhibited by the corporation towards their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, winding up by calling them the "beggarly corporation," a name which stuck until the passing of the Irish Corporation Reform Bill. D'Esterre, who had been a Lieutenant in the Navy, and who had taken an active part in the suppression of the mutiny at the Nore, took up the cudgels in defence of the corporation, and sent a challenge to O'Connell, and the meeting took place on Wednesday, February 1st, 1815, at four o'clock, p. m., at Bishopscourt, in the county of Kildare. Previous to the opponents taking their ground, Sir Edward Stanley, who acted as second to Mr. D'Esterre, addressed Major M'Namara as follows:—"Well, sir, when each has discharged his case of pistols, I hope the affair will be considered as terminated, and that we leave the ground. Major M'Namara replied, "Sir, you may, of course, take your friend from the ground when you please. You, sir, are the challenger, and you may retire from the ground whenever you think proper; but I shall not enter into any such condition as you propose. However, it is probable there may be no occasion to discharge the whole of a case of pistols." And so it turned out: the principals took their ground, both being represented as displaying "the greatest coolness and courage," and, before the lapse of a minute, both shots were heard. Mr. D'Esterre's missed, but Mr. O'Connell's took effect in the thigh of his antagonist, about an inch below the hip. After spending the interval in considerable agony, Mr. D'Esterre expired at 2 o'clock, p. m., on the Friday following, and on the next day Mr. O'Connell received the subjoined letter from Sir Edward Stanley:—

"Royal Barracks, 4th Feb. 1852.

"Sir—Lest your professional avocations should be interrupted by an apprehension of any proceeding being in contemplation, in consequence of the melancholy event, I have the honor to inform you that there is not the most distant intention of any prosecution whatever on the part of the family or friends of the late Mr. D'Esterre.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient,

Edward Stanley.

Daniel O'Connell, Esq., Merrion-square."

To this communication Mr. O'Connell sent the following reply, in which he expressed his regret at the death of his antagonist—a regret which it is well known to his intimate friends he often gave utterance to in after life. In justice to his memory, it may also be mentioned that he offered to settle an annuity upon Mr. D'Esterre's widow, which that lady refused to accept:—

"Merrion-square, 5th Feb., 1815.

"Sir,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, and I beg of you to accept my sincere thanks for your very polite and considerate attention.

"It is to me a mournful consolation to meet such generous sentiments from those who may be afflicted at the late unhappy event. But believe me, my regret at that event is most sincere and unaffected; and, if I know my own heart, I can with the strictest truth assert that no person can feel for the loss society has sustained in the death of Mr. D'Dsterre, with more deep and lasting sorrow than I do.

"Allow me again to thank you, sir, for the courtesy of your letter—a courtesy quite consistent with the gentlemanly demeanor of your entire conduct on this melancholy transaction.

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

Daniel O'Connell.

Sir Edward Stanley."

The result of this duel was most unexpected by Mr. D'Esterre's friends in the Corporation. From the fact of his being considered a "first-rate shot," it was looked upon as almost a matter of certainty that his rather bulky opponent would not have left the ground in a whole skin; and that he did so, under all the circumstances, whether rightly or not, has been attributed by some to the firmness and decision of his second, the late Major Macnamara.

A HOPEFUL VIEW OF GEN. WALKER'S POSITION AND PROSPECTS.

We clip the following clear and able statement from the Daily Times of the 17th inst., to the editor of which journal it was addressed:—

Permit one who has shared largely in the events now distracting Nicaragua to make a few observations on the present state of that unfortunate country.

The accounts of the papers are confirmed in the general outlines of their statements by the most reliable private advices, but the latest letters do not coincide to the same extent in the inference of the press, that Gen. Walker is in a desperate situation. Difficult it is, but not desperate. Without being the eulogist of Gen. Walker, it is not to be admitted that something like two thousand Americans, with rifles in their hands, are to to be exterminated by three or four thousand badly armed and undisciplined men. If, as is stated, the Americans are short of provisions, their enemies are in a still worse condition. It must also be recollected that the Americans occupy the transit, and have on both sides open and prompt steam communication with their rich country and countrymen, who can, if they choose, supply them in ten days with food, clothing and munitions of war to any extent.

The Tennessee left—as the curtain often falls on the fictitious drama—at the crisis of the scene, but comparing the latest letters with the verbal accounts of the most trustworthy passengers, we have this summary of the late events.

The allies had concentrated their forces on the Isthmus, with the double view of seizing the treasure en route from California, and breaking up the transit. General Hornsby's dashing attack with two hundred men had made a serious impression, but had not dislodged the eight or nine hundred Costa Ricans and Guatemalans fortified at San Juan del Sur, to watch and capture the Californian train.

Virgin Bay, as every one understands, is the Depot of the Transit Company on Lake Nicaragua, and connects with San Juan del Sur on the Pacific, by an excellent macadamized road, of about twelve miles. This road General Hornsby traversed to make a flying assault on the enemy, and feel the strength of his position at San Juan del Sur. He carried the first barricade, and wrote to General Walker that "he could take the place and keep it, if it were not for his orders not to expose Virgin's Bay, and the passengers expected by the Tennessee to a repetition of the murderous onslaught perpetrated by the Costa Ricans more than a year since." "As the United States Government does not notice these outrages, and protect its citizens and commerce, we must do it for them." Under these orders Gen. Hornsby returned to Virgin Bay—to protect that end of the land transit, while Gen. Walker himself marched from Granada to San Juan del Sur, and drove out the enemy. Leaving one hundred and seventy-five men to protect San Juan del Sur and communicate with Gen. Hornsby's command at Virgin Bay—thus securing the free transit of the California passengers and treasure—Gen. Walker then returned to Granada with the intention of making that place untenable for the enemy and of concentrating his force on the transit and Rivas.

He established his base line of protection from Lake to Ocean on the 13th of November, and on the 15th we find him forty miles distant, besieging Masaya. On comparing accounts, it would seem that General Walker's object was to dislodge the enemy, and make that place untenable, also; but he only succeeded in part—for after a succession of sharp attacks, continued through three days, he fell back on Granada, to complete the chief feature of his plan. He dispatched the sick and wounded, the women and non-combatants, to the large Island of Ometepe, and after giving due notice to quit to the inhabitants, he embarked on one of the Lake steamers to meet the reinforcements from the United States, known to be on the way up the river to San Carlos.

He left Gen. Henningsen at Granada with 400 men, to destroy the town and bring away the military stores, after the inhabitants had left.

These men, with those stationed on the Transit Line, show an effective force of about 1,200 Americans holding possession of the most commanding points on the Isthmus, without counting the expected reinforcements or the detached and floating parties.

Immediately on the departure of Gen. Walker and his staff, the allies marched into Granada, and as some accounts state, have surrounded Gen. Henningsen in the Church of San Sebastian. How far it may be assumed that Gen. Henningsen was positively in a state of siege, it is impossible to say, as we have no distinct or reliable account beyond the last-known fact, that Gen. Walker had left the city to join his main force, and that Gen. Henningsen had collected his men, munitions, and transportation mules for the march to Rivas. He then occupied the Church of San Sebastian, on a height in an excellent defensive position, and was well supplied with artillery and the necessary munitions of war.

Including the last reinforcements, General Walker must have found himself on landing at Virgin Bay at the head of ten or twelve hundred men, independent of Henningsen's command, and with the means of transporting them by steam in one night to points within a league of Granada, where he could take the allies at disadvantage on flank and rear. It is hardly possible, therefore, to suppose he failed to relieve the Americans in Granada before their condition became desperate.

The California train having already been protected across the Isthmus by his decisive action, and having safely embarked its treasure and passengers on board the New-York steamer, Gen. Walker would be at liberty to throw all his force on Granada, and not only relieve Gen. Henningsen, but bring the war to a close in one decisive battle.

On a careful examination of all the probabilities, I believe this result may be expected with much better reason than we can suppose that a force of two thousand Americans will suffer themselves to be driven from the great Isthmus highway, and yield to their enemies that communication so important to all the States of the Union as well as to Nicaragua.

Yours. AMERICUS.

John P. Heiss addressed the following letter to the Herald of the 17th inst.

Walker's Position and Secretary Marcy.

NEW-YORK, Dec. 16, 1856.

A correspondent of the New-York Sun of this morning makes merry over the reported reverses of General Walker in Nicaragua, and particularly rejoices in the supposed disappointments of those who are here recognized as his friends. Among the number my name is mentioned, and the assertion is made that "mining grants have been awarded me, to be worked by a company formed in New-York."

This is positively false, as I have neither received, nor have I been promised mining grants, land grants, or grants of any character whatever, by the Rivas or Walker rule in Nicaragua. I visited Nicaragua as an American citizen, satisfied myself of the great value of that beautiful and productive country, and invested money, in hard dollars, in the purchase of property from natives who had a legal title to dispose of the same. Since then I have sustained General Walker, because I knew his motives to be just; and when a question arises between American progress and savage despotism, I trust I shall always be found on the American side.

The allusion that the "malicious Marcy will enjoy the prostration" of the cause in Nicaragua, and myself with it, may be very consoling to the Sun's correspondent; but if the "malicious Marcy" enjoyed the murders committed upon unarmed American citizens at Virgin Bay, on the 11th of April last, I did not. If the "malicious Marcy" received with pleasure the information that an American minister of the gospel, and defenceless men, women and children were butchered in cold blood by the combined forces of Guatemala and San Salvador, (who carried on their banners, "death to all North Americans,") at Granada, on the 11th of October, I would rather be the disappointed J. P. Heiss than the happy "malicious Marcy;" and if the latter can also enjoy in the "prostration of the Nicaragua cause," the massacre of 250 women, children and wounded American soldiers on the Island of "Ometepe" by the savages of Central America, he is entitled to all the benefits of the same—but as an American at heart and in principle, my sympathies are of a character directly opposite. If the "malicious Marcy" can say to the friends of Nicaragua, "Americans have no business in that country," I cannot agree with him. I believe that Americans have a right to emigrate to any soil in the universe, and when on that soil they are entitled to the sympathies of their countrymen.

When the American government sympathizes with the despotic savages of Guatemala, San Salvador and Costa Rica, against our own countrymen, I trust that I shall not fail to prove true to my American nature in the cause of humanity, but aid, to the extent of my power and influence, the cause of American progress.

If Walker had been driven out of Nicaragua by Nicaraguans, no American could have complained; but can an American at heart witness a combination of all the Central American savages against him and his brave followers without boldly coming up to his defence, notwithstanding his enemies may have the sympathies of the "malicious Marcy."

General Walker would never have had any difficulty with the natives of Nicaragua if it had not been for the invasion of the neighboring States. This was encouraged at first by the refusal of the United States government to recognize Nicaragua. If it had been left entirely with the natives of that republic to have decided upon, they would have sustained General Walker's rule, and Nicaragua would now have been prosperous and happy.

It is true that the position of General Walker may appear critical; but his present situation has been brought about by his endeavors to protect the lives and property of American citizens on the Transit route to California—a sacred duty which our own government has failed to perform. But notwithstanding these apparent reverses, I still have the greatest confidence in Walker's success, and the complete overthrow of his savage enemies. His enemies in this country I will leave under the especial protection of the "malicious Marcy" and the correspondent of the New York Sun. JOHN P. HEISS.

THE EMMET LIFE GUARD BALL, comes off on the 29th inst. at the City Assembly Rooms.

Capt. Lynch and his assistants of the Guard are so earnest and untiring in their exertions that it can't fail to be a brilliant success.

In a rich and varied assortment of Carpetings, Rugs, Mats, Oil Cloths and Mattings, the Houses on the Bowery and Sixth Avenue rival the most extensive establishments in that trade on Broadway. In the Bowery, the store of Arthur Donnelly, and in the Sixth Avenue that of Stephen Leahy, is admirably stocked.

Mrs. Luby announces "Assemblies," on every other Wednesday evening during the season, at her Dancing Academy, 275 Bleecker street. The one that came off on the 17th inst. was a truly joyous re-union.

MR. L. SHORT, the polite and efficient Treasurer of the famed Buckley's Serenaders, announces his Benefit to take place on Friday evening the 26th inst. He should have an over-flowing house.

There are now seven churches of the Unitarian order in the city and vicinity, while a few years since there were but two societies. There are two in New-York, viz: Rev. Dr. Bellow's and Rev. Dr. Osgood's; three in Brooklyn, (one being in Williamsburg,) of which Rev. John Pierpont, Rev. Dr. Farley, and Rev. Mr. Longfellow are pastors; one at Staten Island, of which Rev. Mr. Parkman is pastor; and one at Jersey City, of which Rev. Mr. Frothingham is minister. The two former have splendid churches, with large and influential congregations in the city, viz: "Church of all Souls," and "Church of the Messiah." The "Church of the Saviour," of Brooklyn, (First Church,) own a fine edifice; and the churches of Staten Island and Jersey City have each comfortable edifices. The Second Church of Brooklyn contemplate building an inexpensive chapel ere long, and the Third Church (at Williamsburg is increasing in numbers and interest. We learn that preliminary steps have been taken for the organization of a Fourth Church in South Brooklyn, and a considerable sum is already received for a suitable building.

From present appearances the Adriatic will be able to make her trial trip immediately after New Year's. She has all her machinery and a large quantity of coal on board. Steam has been applied, and the wheels revolved with a force sufficient almost to drag the pier itself from its foundation. She will be the best modeled, the strongest, and most powerful steamship afloat, and we predict will beat the Persia before making three trips.

The Post understands "that an expedition is fitting out for Nicaragua in this city, and that 500 men are enlisted, or to be enlisted in it. They are mostly people of Irish birth or descent. The immediate destination of the expedition is Omoa, in Honduras, where they will land and then proceed to join Walker." We have not understood that more than one-half that number are so anxious to die of cholera.

The Chamber of Commerce have adopted a memorial praying Congress to make an appropriation for the removal of Hell-gate, Diamond and Coenties Reefs.

American News.

Mr. De Bow, in his compendium of the census, gives the value of the agricultural productions of the United States in 1850 as $1,320,691,326, and states that in 1854 it had increased to $1,600,000,000. The total tonnage of the United States in 1855 was 5,212,000; of which 2,535,136 tons consisted of seagoing vessels. The internal commerce of the country, in 1852, is thus stated by Andrews:—

Coasting trade	$3,319,439,372
Canal commerce	1,188,000,000
Railway commerce	1,081,500,000

The product of manufactures and mechanics, for 1855, it is estimated by competent authorities, will approach the value of $1,500,000; and the products of the seas, including fisheries, freights, transportation, etc., $1,200,000,000. In addition to the immense capital invested in commerce and manufactures in the United States, there is either improved, or under actual cultivation, not less than 113,032,614 acres of land. Within the last twenty-five years nearly $800,000,000 have been invested in railroads alone, and corresponding sums have been expended in other forms of internal improvements—ordinary roads, canals, improving the channels of rivers, harbors, &c.

The New-York Atlas craves attention to the following significant political facts:—Fillmore lost his own state, New-York; Donelson lost Tennessee, and now (as General Walker elegantly expressed it) the "amber of Gen. Jackson's greatness" alone preserves him from oblivion; Dayton lost New Jersey, and Fremont lost California. On the other hand, Buchanan recovered Pennsylvania for the democracy; and Breckinridge gloriously redeemed Kentucky from Know-Nothingism. The Presidential Electors of Maryland met at Annapolis, according to law, and gave eight votes for Fillmore. This is the number of American citizens killed in the election riots at Baltimore, by the Know-Nothings. A dead man for every vote, and every vote for a dead man!

A telegraph despatch from Louisville of the 15th inst. states that the Courier of that city says that on Saturday morning the Rev. Mr. Anderson, a preacher of the Methodist Church of the North, and chief of the Abolitionists of Madison, Indiana, was captured while on board the steamer Telegraph, and his carpet-bag taken from him. His carpet-bag was found to be filled with incendiary documents, proving that he had been engaged in running off slaves from the neighborhood of Carrollton. The papers found in his possession also implicate many distinguished Northerners. He was taken yesterday by the steamer Superior to Carrollton, where $600 had been offered for his capture and arrest.

John Mitchel says:—"The warlike hunters of the county of Blunt, (amongst whom he resides in Tennessee,) have had no idea until his recent settlement among them, that the British government survived the charge by which their fathers drove the red coats over their native mountains, and had positively imagined that Andrew Jackson made a full end of British power for ever; but since they find there are still more British regiments in existence, they are at sharper practice with their rifles, with which already they were so expert as to shoot a squirrel in the eye at one hundred yards." Depend upon it, says the Day Book, their rifles will be needed before the haughty aristocracy of Great Britain give up their warfare upon Democratic institutions.

The Albany Transcript gives an account of the operations of some ingenious villain in that city, who is filling his pockets by pretending to sell, but not actually selling, counterfeit coin. It seems that, having first baited with a circular, he sends good coin to the applicants at his shop, who, having bought a small lot and found it to pass without objection, send $50 or $100 for a larger supply, which he coolly pockets and shuts down the gate, leaving his fellow-knaves to whistle for their enemy!

Canadian papers give warning against two new and very ingenious counterfeits on Canadian banks. One is a note of the Bank of Upper Canada, altered from one to ten dollars, by an ingenious process. The other is a still more dangerous fraud, being a capitally executed $10 note on the Commercial Bank of Canada. This requires the shrewdest investigation to discover the deception.

The Alexandria, Va., Gazette announces the death of Gen. John G. Chapman, of Charles county, Maryland. He was one of the most estimable citizens of Maryland, had filled with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of the people several important offices, and had represented his district in Congress.

The message of John Ross, President of the Cherokee Nation, represents the affairs of the Nation as in a prosperous condition. Civilization is progressing steadily, and religion and education receive marked attention. He represents the urgent necessity for providing for the payment of the national debt, and an increase of the school fund, and recommends as a means of accomplishing these objects, a retrocession of the neutral land. Respecting the complaints against persons connected with the American Board of Missions, of tampering with the slaves, he says, slavery being recognized by the laws of the Nation, is entitled to protection, and the agitation and disturbance of it by citizens of the United States is wholly unwarrantable.

A party hunting in Angelina county, Texas, found in a cave two human bodies completely petrified, dressed in a style neither Indian nor European. The features and dress were admirably preserved. A garment which must have resembled a hunting shirt, seemed to have been worn by each, and partly preserved by petrifaction, was distinctly visible, especially at its seams and folds. On the waist of one was a buckle of pure gold, almost three inches in diameter, securely imbedded in the body. The features were not much shrunken; the eyes were partly closed and even traces of the eyebrows could be seen plainly.

Lieut. D. D. Porter, commanding U. S. storeship Supply, writes to the War Department, on the 14th ult., from Smyrna, that he would sail for the United States on the 15th (the next day,) and expected to reach the mouth of the Mississippi by the 29th of January—there to turn over his cargo of camels to an officer of the War Department, prepared with a steamer to receive them and take them to Texas. Lieut. Porter had on board the Supply forty four camels—six of which were presented to the government by the Sultan; the remainder were purchased by Lieut. P.

The Newark, N. J., Mercury relates a case of a boy, about twelve or fourteen years of age, who is kept at work at one of the factories of that city from 7 A. M. till 10 P. From the report for the ten months ending 31st October, says the Belfast Mercury, it appears that the tonnage entering the port during that period this year was 645,256, which compared with the amount for the same period last year, shows an increase of 26,230 tons. The arrivals of Irish sailing-vessels, and cross-channel vessels have greatly fallen off, the decrease being 23,319 tons on the former, and 14,972 tons on the latter; there is an increase of 9,168 tons on vessels engaged in the foreign trade, and of 45,553 tons on the steamers. The revenue of the port exhibits an increase of £1,036, or about £1,209 on the whole year as compared with that of 1855. It is to be regretted that the great bulk of our exports to America, should be sent through Liverpool, Glasgow, and other ports.

A Loughrea correspondent of Saunders's News-Letter states that one of the houses out of which the tenantry were evicted on the Dartfield property, was set on fire and totally destroyed. Mr. Cantwell—Let poor Mick in; if he could help it he would not come here.

Applicant—Success to you, Mr. Tom, and if I had my ould chanter I'd give ye all a tune (laughter).

Chairman—I am afraid, Mick, that is not the same boy you had here before.

Applicant—Oh, by the piper of Blessington, but it is; and though I cannot see you, I know you are fond of a jig (laughter). But will ye try, for the sake of old Carolan, and make me out an old chanter, and I will quit out of this street in a jiffey. Ah! it is a queer place to keep a musical janius (renewed laughter). Provide me a good pair of pipes and if I don't show ye fun, if ye are in humor for dancing, and I know ye are, God bless ye (laughter), there is not a shaver in Cork, I am certain (more laughter).

Mr. Daniel—Are you a Clonmel boy, Mr. piper?

Applicant—Wisha, indeed, I am, and my father danced to the "Wearing of the Green" before you were born.

Mr. Cantwell—We are sure you won't stay long with us here if we provide you with what you want, Mick.

Applicant—Be sure of it, my darling.

Mr. Cantwell—Mr. Murphy, try and make him out the pipes as soon as you can.

Master—I will, and till then I will lend him a flute (laughter).

The funny piper then withdrew.

At the recent cattle fair of Drogheda heifers a year and a half old sold from £6 to £7 per head, and those of a particular nice quality, in some instances, higher. Springers and milkers were scarce, and very dear.

The Maryborough Town Commissioners have obtained a patent to hold Twelve Yearly Fairs in the Town of Maryborough, on the 1st January, 24th February, 25th March, 14th April, 12th May, 5th June, 5th July, 5th Aug., 4th Sept., 23d Oct., 13th Nov., 4th Dec.

Fifty sovereigns have been presented by the High Sheriff of Cork to Head Constable Crowley, in acknowledgment of his services to the city in breaking up a formidable band of burglars by his vigilance and sagacity.

A correspondent of the Clonmel Chronicle, reporting the last hunt of the Marquis of Waterford's fox hounds at Mullinavat, says :—"At the hour appointed the sportsmen from the counties of Kilkenny, Waterford and Tipperary, began to arrive, and five minutes past eleven o'clock, the Most Noble the Marquis of Waterford, drove up in his phæton, accompanied by many of his hunting friends. His lordship mounted a magnificent bay horse, which he purchased for the sum of 400 guineas. On the word being given, the huntsman—Johnny Ryan—trotted off for the well-known cover of Killeen, the property of John Jones. Esq., Mullinabro, a strict preserver of foxes. The hounds were thrown in, and immediately was heard the joyful cry of 'he's found,' from Captain Jephson, when a brace of foxes went away, but unfortunately got on a cub, who ran a ring, and back to the cover again. At this moment the whistle of the train from Kilkenny to Waterford was heard; the noble master gave the word to stop the hounds, every person anxiously awaiting the absence of the disturber of this sport. When all danger was over, the hounds once more dashed at their game, and away went as fine a fox as ever broke cover, the pack close at him. Away they went, racing—pointing towards Mullinavat—then across the Waterford and Kilkenny Railway, which presented a very strong obstruction; some were fortunate enough to get over quickly; others not so. Reynard then went for the old cover of Ballymooney. At this time the pace was terrific—heads up and sterns down; then taking the mountain, the gallant pack, close at hand, ran him to the ground at Colnahaw. Time—38 minutes without hesitation. The only person up at the finish, and who rode the run from beginning to end, in his accustomed brilliant style, was Henry Brisco, Esq., Thivane, mounted on a thorough-bred black mare. Every one who was fortunate enough to see the run through at a long distance, was highly pleased, at the same time envying the person who was able to live with hounds, flying as they were. The distance from point to point, as the crow flies, was eight miles."

The best run, says the Dublin Freeman, that the oldest inhabitant remembers, took place with the Ward stag hounds, the 22d ult. They commenced at the Ward Union, Phidolph, near Kilrue, at ten minutes after one P. M., ran to within a mile and a half of the town of Trim, and finished at Culmullen, the pace throughout being unparalleled in the annals of hunting. Out of the field numbering more than one hundred, but a very few lived to tell the tale—namely, Charles Bindley, the Huntsman, Captain Stoddart, on his gray mare, Mr. Martin Kelly, of Donaymoor, riding his celebrated brown horse, one of the Mr. Ennis's of the Naule, Mr. Gustavus Frederick Hamilton, of the Guards, and two other gentlemen, who would prefer, perhaps, not seeing their names in print. The master of the hounds rode throughout this desperate run, as he always does, with others, who, although not absolutely going to finish, still made a gallant fight for it. The casualties were numerous, as might be fairly expected in so gallant a stag chase, an ugly one occurring to an English gentleman, one of the best sportsmen and hardest riders out, of which the least said the better, as it is not by any means unlikely he will be all right and going well to his hounds ere this day week. It is but fair to state that Mr. Tyrrell, of Strokestown, a sporting gentleman farmer, riding a gray horse, was amongst the select few who went well all through, and declined a stiff price for his nag on the way home.

Speaking of the linen trade, the Banner of Ulster says :—"The excitement created in the United States on the subject of the Presidential election having come to an end, the people on the other side of the Atlantic will now cool down to the quiet habits of business. We may anticipate a very full amount of transactions with those customers for the spring trade. Demand for eight-quarter sheetings has considerably improved, and markets are generally bare of that class of linens. Brown markets were well supplied with goods all the week. Weavers and drapers push on production to its fullest extent, and the rates of wages earned by energetic hands being above the average, give great spirit to the operatives. Lurgan was well attended by buyers on Thursday, and large quantities of goods found a fair market. Damasks continue to occupy a good share of public attention, and several makers of that variety of the fancy goods are extending their operations. Yarns are quiet. The famine prices for money have had a most injurious effect on the yarn market. Top qualities of warps sell at extreme rates. Some parcels of 100 lea were taken yesterday at 7s. 6d. per bundle. Flax is unchanged in prices; medium and fine ranges of the fibre sell at full rates; coarse parcels a shade lower.

The Tuam Herald informs us that Sergeants Goggins and Hanlon of the 88th Regiment were entertained to a banquet in Daley's Hotel, given by a large number of the townspeople who were anxious to testify their regard and pay a tribute of welcome to two natives of Tuam who had distinguished themselves in the most conspicuous manner during the sanguinary and dreadful campaign of the Crimean war. Both had taken part in the memorable battles of Alma and Inkermann, and in the storming of the Redan, and were present, without intermission, throughout the whole siege of Sebastopol. From the very first shot fired in the Crimea till its evacuation by the allied armies, the brave Connaught Rangers were always to be found playing a gallant and distinguished part; and, accordingly, on the safe return home of two members of the regiment, their fellow citizens availed themselves of the earliest opportunity to pay them this marked compliment as a tribute of their personal esteem. Upwards of eighty were present. The chair was occupied by Wm. Gannon, Esq., T.C., and the vice chair by P. T. Burke, Esq., T.C.

The remains of this much lamented lady, (Mrs. Phelps), says the Limerick Observer, arrived here from Rome on Friday last, by the night train from Dublin, and were conveyed to Plassy, where the Roman coffin, containing the body, was placed in a splendid mahogany sarcophagus, richly ornamented, on the plate of which was engraved :—"Georgina Phelps, died at Rome, November 4, 1856, aged 21 years." The funeral was numerously attended by the gentry of the neighborhood, and the remains were placed in the Maunsell family vault, St. John's. An impressive sermon was preached by the Rev. John Elmes, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Willis.

The Waterford papers state that the Malakoff, during some of her late trips from the port of Waterford, had on board dead pigs and dead sheep, packed in crates, and fit for the butcher's stall sent by parties in the county Tipperary for the London market. The transit of this meat from Cahir to London, via. Waterford, has occupied about thirty-six hours.

The Chief Secretary of Ireland, Mr. Horsman, has addressed a letter to Mr. Daniel Cullen, T.C., Limerick, intimating that the Lords Justices of the Privy Council have sanctioned a bye-law prohibiting the use of nets between the railway bridge and the weir at Curragower mill from the first of June in each year to the 11th of the following February. The effect of the bye-law will be to diminish considerably the means of support of several families in the North Strand, who mainly depend on fishing in the waters of the Shannon for their maintenance.

The Committee of the Cork Athenæum held the first of their "Saturday Evening Musical Promenades" on the 22d ult., which proved very successful, as far as musical talent and ability are concerned; but, owing to the high charges, there were but few of the working people present. The committee have since resolved to reduce the charges for admittance to a small sum, which will be a great boon to the working classes.

On the 21st ult., a fire broke out in the premises of the back shop of Mr. T. G. Nairn, George's street, Limerick, which at first created considerable alarm; but the prompt assistance of a large body of police, under Major Caldwell, county inspector, and Mr. M'Leod, subdued the flames without any considerable injury to the property.

In the West Ward, Waterford, James Butler Hughes was elected town councillor in room of Mr. John Kenny, raised to the office of alderman. It is rumored that this young gentleman will be a candidate for the office of mayor for the ensuing year.

On the evening of the 28th ult., some soldiers of the 39th had a quarrel with some others of the 17th in a whiskey shop in Boherbuoy, Limerick, when a street fight ensued. The 17th were roughly handled by the 39th, and two of them, it is said, would have been killed were it not for the prompt interference of Constable Doyle and his party.

THE IRISH PRESS ON JAMES BUCHANAN'S ELECTION.

From the Waterford Chronicle.

Buchanan has been elected President of the great Republic by a majority of 60 votes. This gives the death-stroke to the declinining power of American "Know-Nothingism," and leaves the old Democratic party at the head of the Republic. The Times, and many other of the principal English journals, are wroth at this. They would perhaps prefer seeing Fillmore or Fremont in the ascendant. One to persecute and proscribe the foreigner; the other to pass a code of laws that would inevitably separate the popular sovereignty into two great segments. Once separated, there would never again be national co-operation, and without co-operation, neither would there be power. England would rejoice at this, for with a deep, settled, latent chronic hate, these two great nations do hate each other.

England dreads the growing power of the States, and America, with feverish dislike, watches the "Foreign Intervention" of England. 'Tis the way—tendency and idiosyncratic bent of England to busy itself with the business of other States, and the current of American opinion sets right against this influx of foreign meddling. It is ever present to their minds, and on their tongue-tips, and history never named a race so jealous of interference with their national domain, moral and physical, as the Americans are. It is singular that the American people should have selected for the Presidency that man who was most censured by the English press, and denounced by the Dublin Evening Mail on account of his own antecedents and political principles, and that they should have rejected the two men who had the opinion of England and the Irish conservative journals in their favor.

We are happy to observe that the Irish Priests, Press, and People sided, universally and energetically, with Buchanan, and thus again had a strong hand in saving to the American people the threatened Constitution of their country. The new President is a high-hearted, clear-headed man. He has a patience, a resolute will, and a fine breadth of conception. Under his sway we look for peace, the spread of knowledge, and the continued growth of that ramificating commerce which has made America what her energetic sons are justly proud of.

From the Waterford News.

The last accounts from the United States bring the gratifying news, as we anticipated, of the election of James Buchanan to fill the proudest position in the world, President of the United States—the choice of out-spoken millions. We delight at this triumph of the Democratic principle on which the constitution is founded, over the disordered and brutal rowdyism of Know-Nothing infidelity; and we are sure every true Irishman at home will rejoice with us, as we know every Irishman in the United States, who has attained the proud position of citizenship, recorded his vote for James Buchanan, feeling that his election meant the preservation of the union of the States.

It is worthy of remark how this election has belied the inclinings and predictions of the press of New-York and London. Fremont, the Know-Nothing and disunionist, is said to be the richest man in the world, and the shining ore has a wonderful effect, it is said, on New-York daily journalism; and in London, the desire to frustrate and break up the onward march of the Republic, now surpassing England in everything, has called forth an amount of scurrility for which the London daily papers are excelsior. Mr. Buchanan's independence, too, whilst representative of the United States in England, created a hostile feeling towards him there, and is another cause to which his vilification may be attributed. He will soon have the power of resentment, but we trust he may use it temperately.

The offices of President and Vice-President are the only ones in the United States which the constitution prohibits a foreigner from holding, but the present election has elevated a man as near as possible to an Irishman, viz., the son of an Irishman, from the north of Ireland, like the father of the celebrated disunionist John C. Calhoun.

ANCESTRY OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

An Irish paper, the Londonderry Standard, gives the following account of the ancestry of the President elect.

James Buchanan is now President of the United States, and a brief notice of his historical lineage may not be uninteresting to some of our readers. The Clan Buchanan, though located in the Highlands of Scotland since the tenth century, derives its origin from the O'Kanes of County Derry, according to its oldest archives and traditions, as published in the year 1723, by William Buchanan, of Auchmar, under the title of "An Historical and Genealogical Essay upon the Family and Surname of Buchanan." This volume was reprinted at Edinburgh, in 1775, and it contains the accredited history of the sept, as drawn up by one of its chiefs from documentary and other sources.

The story is briefly this—Aslan Buidhe O'Kane was one of the Irish youths who, in the habit of ladies, had attended the celebrated banquet given by Turgesius, the Danish general, to his officers, and who, with concealed daggers under their dresses, dispatched their brutal enemies when the latter imagined they had in prospect only scenes of drunken licentiousness. When the Danes recovered from the surprise into which they had been thrown by the slaughter of their leaders, they inflicted terrible revenge upon the native Irish, and Aslan O'Kane, with a small band of attendants, passed over to the north of Argyleshire, near the Lennox, where he settled, and soon afterwards distinguished himself in the service of the Scottish monarch in two battles against the Danes of England. Extensive lands were consequently assigned to Aslan and his followers, who, during two centuries afterwards, were called "Mac Aslan"—in modern orthography. "M'Causland," this having been the original designation of the Clan Buchanan.

The name of Buchanan appears in the first instance to have been territorial—"Buadh Chuanain"—"Cnanan's conquest;" and it was not until the 13th century that it was assumed as a surname, a portion of the clan, however, still retaining their ancient family name of "Mac Aslan." In ancient charters the name of Buchanan frequently appears as "O'Quahuanan," ("Ui Chuanain,") with the regular Irish prefix, meaning descendants of Cuanan, or Conan, and between them and the Dungiven O'Kanes a friendly recognition of kindred, according to our author was constantly maintained. The powerful clan in question was divided eventually into the leading families of Auchmar, Arnpryor, Drumikill, Lenny, Carbeth, Auchneiven, &c., and from these principal stems branched off, in the course of time, a considerable number of sub-denominations, as the "M'Causlands," M'Millans, M'Wattles, M'Robbs, M'Collmans, M'Aldins, a section of the M'Kinleys, ("sons of Finley," &c., &c. The ancestors of the principal families of M'Causland in the North of Ireland are stated by our author to have been "Andrew and John Mac Auselan, sons of the Baron Mac Auselan, who went out of Luss to that kingdom in the latter part of the reign of James VI. Alexander, a son of Mac Auselan, held a comission in the army during the civil wars in the reign of Charles I., and he acquired "partly by debenture and partly by purchase, the estates of Resh and Ardstraw, in the county of Tyrone." Amongst the ancestors of the Buchanans in Ulster, our author mentions Robert, son of the Laird of Blairbenachan, a cadet of the Drumikill family, "who went to Ireland and resided in Glenmaqueen, in the county of Derry," also a cadet of the Drumhead family, named George, who is said to have resided in the neighborhood of Raphoe. This gentleman, we are informed, "purchased a pretty good interest in that kingdom," and had two sons, "the eldest succeeded in his interest; the youngest became a clergyman." From Finlay, son of Patrick Buchanan called "Courrui," or the "champion, in consequence of his daring character," are descended Alexander Buchanan, father of James Buchanan, now of Cremannan, who, with his sons, now reside in Ireland, the author adding in a subsequent passage "of Patrick, the fourth son of Patrick, the Courrui, is descended Finlay Buchanan, in Leggan of Tyrconnell, in Ireland, who has some brethren, and other relations of that race, near Raphoe, and some other places of that kingdom." A branch of the Carbeth Buchanans also settled in Tyrone and Donegal, one of its members, George, in Munster, while those of the same name in Down and Antrim are generally descended from the family of Wester Ballat, a cadetship of the house of Drumikill.

James Buchanan, the American President, is descended from a family of those early settlers in the North of Ireland. His grandfather, we believe, was a farmer in the townland of Tattyregh, parish of Drumragh, in county Tyrone, about four miles from Omagh. His father, the eldest of two sons, emigrated to the United States some time towards the end of the last century, and died in America, having never revisited his native country. Some of his relatives are still resident in county Tyrone, and occupy respectable positions in society.

A CHRONICLE OF THE DEATH OF SHANE O'NIALL.

From the Dublin University Magazine.

"Roughened his brow—his temples bared,
And sable hair with silver shared;
Yet left, what age alone could tame,
The lip of pride and eye of flame."—ROKEBY.

On a dark tempestuous evening in the autumn of 1567, a curragh or light boat was seen beating its way from the Tyrone shore of Lough Neagh, with a sail set which seemed large enough to capsize the tiny bark, and with two well-known kernes occupying the seats. One of these was a stout, weather-beaten, red-haired peasant, with a saffron roquelaire, such as was worn by the ancient Irish; the other, a smaller person, similarly equipped. The taller kerne steered the boat, and the other minded the sail, while a pair of oars lay along the gunwale beside them. The wind was against them and they made but little headway, while the short swell caused them to roll about, and often deluged them with spray. For nearly an hour they endeavored to proceed, without success, when at length the taller exclaimed—"Take down the sails, Con, in St. Mary's name; we must to the oars, or we shall not set foot upon the island to-night. I would we had better news to tell when we do reach it." Con obeyed, the mast was taken down, and seizing their oars, they gave way, and dashed through the water gallantly. The planks of the curragh creaked as the two stout peasants bent the ashen oaks with the strength of their pulling; and in a short time the trees of Ram's Island hove in sight. The sun had sunk, and the sky, which still retained its hue of departing light, threw a faint glare upon the water, rendering the surface of the lake more forbidding, as it tossed and rolled, seething and boiling, as fresh water only does. The curragh still went forward, however, cleaving the waves with her bow, and nearing the island every moment. At length they had but a short distance to traverse ere they landed, when Con, peering earnestly into the gathering darkness, said to his companion:—

"Look out by Foig-na-Gall, Teague. Is there not a boat out upon the lake to-night, as well as ourselves?"

His companion looked as he was directed, and replied:—"Thine eyes are are good, Con. There surely is a curragh behind us, and mine mislead me if she be not giving us chase. I hope in St. Patrick that she may not be one of the craft of Calvagh O'Donnell, who has overrun Ardboe. Hugh," he exclaimed, as a flash from the boat astern was reflected in the lake, and next moment the report of a harquebuss reverberated across the water, and its shot fell a few yards in their wake—

"'Tis the hell-hounds of Tyrconnell!" exclaimed Teague. "Pull, Con; for the life of the O'Niall, give way."

His companion answered his call so well that his pressure on his oar wheeled round and almost upset the curragh before Teague himself could obey his own command. In a few moments she righted, however, and was going through the waters as fast as the brawny rowers could drive her. The waves broke upon her brow with phosphorescent whiteness, and often swept over the hardy peasants from stem to stern. Meanwhile, the other boat was not idle; she followed the chase with a speed that showed the strength of her crew, and her own power of sailing. She was long and canoe-built, and pulled at least three oars a side. She was gaining every moment upon the boat of the O'Nialls, (for they were adherents of Shane a Diomas,) and they, on their part, redoubled their efforts to escape. At length the chase neared the shore without her occupants being aware of its proximity, and giving one strong pull, they ran high and dry upon the strand, with a shock which threw both out of the curragh upon the beach. In another moment, Teague was on his feet again, and raising a savage howl, he darted in amongst the bushes, followed by Con. The signal was answered from the centre of the island, and immediately figures appeared amongst the trees, coming down towards the shore. The boat which had been in chase now reached the land; the rowers lay upon their oars, and two persons sprang out upon the island and made for the wood. They had scarcely advanced a step, however, when the twang of a bow from the trees was followed by the fall of one of them, and immediately the O'Nialls sprang out of their cover and attacked the second. The boatmen came to the rescue, and a general fight ensued. The O'Nialls shouted the warcry of their sept, and the answer of "Tyrconnell-aboo!" declared the invaders to be, as Teague had conjectured, retainers of Calvagh O'Donnell, whose wife was at that time the mistress of Shane O'Niall. The fight was short. The O'Donnells were overpowered by numbers, and in a few minutes they had all fallen victims to their rashness, except one powerful gallowglass, who had been brought to his knees, and was struggling against the glittering skeine of one of the islanders. The O'Niall was deaf to his entreaties, however, and was just about to despatch him, when a tall man issued from the wood and exclaimed—

"Hold thy hand, Turlough Buie. Put up thy skeine, I command thee!"

This latter intruder was a tall and martial-looking figure, wearing a helmet of steel, upon which appeared conspicuously the "Blood-Hand," and enveloped in a Spanish cloak, decorated extravagantly with gold.*

Turlough Buie, the person addressed, loosed his hold of his victim in a moment, and retired from before the Speaker, who was Shane O'Niall himself.

"What was thine errand upon the lake, O'Donnell?" he asked, as he approached the prisoner. "Let thine answer be the truth, or by St. John thou shalt hang from the highest tree in the island."

"We were out along the Lough-shore, seeking those who robbed the Lord Deputy's courier of the letters which he bore for the O'Donnell, and we gave chase to thy kernes, knowing it to have been them," replied O'Donnell.

"Ha!" exclaimed O'Niall, starting and turning to his followers. "So Teague O'Hagan hath done his errand well. Where are the letters?"

"There is but one, my chief," said Teague, handing a letter to O'Niall.

"Off, some one, for Father Francis!" he commanded, as he received the letter and broke the large seal, which bore the royal arms of England.

A score started through the wood in obedience of his command, and in a few minutes re-appeared, accompanied by an old priest of the Capuchin order, of which the chaplains of the Irish chiefs of that day, were, for the most part composed.

"Here is need for thy skill, holy father," said O'Niall, as he handed the priest the letter, and motioned his attendants out of hearing of the contents. The priest bowed, and taking the paper, read as follows:

"From the Righte Noble Sir Henrie Sydney, Knight, Lord Deputie of her Majestie Elizabeth, Queen of England, to Calvagh O'Donnell, Prince of Tyrconnell.

"Greeting—Right Trustie and Well-beloved: Her Majestie greeteth thee well, ande is not forgetfull of thy charges upon her behalfe. These are to advertise thee, that the traitore Shane O'Niall will receive no further mercie from the Queene; and that it is our intention to make a hosting into Tir-oen, and cut him off root and branche. In this, our engagement, we have the assurance of Maguire of Fermanagh, MacMahon of Monaghan, and of thyself, (chiefest of all), that they will render us all good aide and assistance. You will therefore, on having safely these presents, raise troopes and besiege his castle of Foich-nsagall, with as little delaye as may bee; all which you shall do at the coste and charges of the Queen's Majestie.

That Christe may keep thee, is the desire of

HENRIE SYDNEY,
Lord Deputie.

Given from the Castle of Dublin. October, 15, 1567."

"Maguire and MacMahon!" exclaimed O'Niall, as the priest ceased reading, "and O'Donnell, too, against me! But by St. Patrick's staff, the Red Hand shall fight them yet, and this roguish Scot, M'Donnell, do not turn traitor."

He snatched the billet from the hand of Father Francis, and turning to his followers, he exclaimed:

"Hang up that dog, O'Donnell!" He entered the wood and took shelter in a little hut in the centre of the island.

The evening had worn on till midnight, and the unfortunate clansman of O'Donnell had long since been sent to his account. O'Niall was brooding moodily over the remains of a wood fire, which smouldered in the chimney of his hut, the head of the Lady O'Donnell, leaning on his breast, when one of the followers, who were keeping ward without, burst into the apartment.

"There are more of those hell-hound O'Donnells upon the lake, my chief!" exclaimed the gallowglass. "They are howling in their curraghs all round the island."

O'Niall sprang to his feet and rushed to the door of the hut, where the friar stood in the midst of the followers. A distinct low howl seemed borne upon the air, but from what point none could tell. It seemed now here, now there, all round the island; and momentarily some of the kernes who were acting as picquets round the shore, ran to the hut to tell that the noise was immediately beside their station. Meanwhile the sound continued, stopping at intervals, when a noise like the clapping of hands was heard, and the howl renewed again with greater vigor than before. An old woman, who was attendant upon the Lady Tyrconnell, sat down upon her knees in terror, and commenced counting her beads rapidly, and muttering her prayers. At length O'Niall looked at the group of frightened guards which surrounded him, and exclaimed, his eyes flashing with rage:

"Your fears are deceiving you, caitiff's! there is no sound abroad, nor a voice to stir the air."

"Canst thou not hear it, Shane O'Niall?" asked the old woman, springing to her feet and throwing her beads from her hand.

"Silence, beldame!" said the chieftain. "But it is little for thee to fear," he added, "when my doughty followers tremble so."

"Then, Blessed Virgin!" exclaimed she, "my fears are too true. If thine ears are deaf to the sound, the warning is for thee—it is the BANSHEE!"

A groan escaped the soldiers as the old woman ceased speaking, and O'Niall, spurning her with his foot, addressed them:

"I know, my clansmen, that ye will not fear an old woman's raving. The letter I seized from the courier of the Sassanach, tells me of the treachery of all my vassal Tanists. I must join me with Mac Donnell and the Scots of Clanhuboy. Let those who will follow me get off the curragh this moment."

A cheer rose from the kernes, and each answered that he would follow him to the death.

An hour had scarcely elapsed, ere O'Niall appeared upon the beach of the island, accompanied by the Baniernia,* Lady O'Donnell, where the retainers were congregated in a group, and four curraghs were moored, ready to cast off and bear them across to the Antrim shore. The night was more tempestuous than ever; the waves of the lake, rolled in and broke with an eternal murmur upon the gravel; and ever-and-anon the spray was dashed in the face of the group, as they looked out upon the water.

"Has each man his harquebuss?" demanded O'Niall.

"All," was the reply.

"Then, to the curraghs, and shove off; we are long enough in jeopardy. The O'Donnells suspect our retreat, and if the host of Tirconnell come upon us there is an end to the crying of Shamdheary aboo!"

The men obeyed with alacrity. O'Niall conducted the lady to the boat, and ordered his followers away. For a distance they rowed with but little difficulty; but, as they proceeded and began to get under the lee of the land, the breeze caught them, and they found that the waves of the lake were running very high. From side to side the boats rolled, sometimes endangering their equilibrium, and almost pitching out their occupants. O'Niall occasionally spoke to his men in tones of encouragement, and showed them the necessity of escaping from the vicinity of the O'Donnells. As he remarked on this subject to the men of one of the boats, who were murmuring greatly at the prospect before them, one of them replied:—

"If O'Donnell did take us, it were as well to be his soldiers as to be the soldiers of O'Niall.

O'Niall on hearing this reply, ordered his rowers to pull alongside the boat in which the speaker sat; in a moment he had laid hold of its gunwale.

"Is there any here who will second the proposal of that renegade, Maguire, who wishes to desert to O'Donnell!" he demanded.

---

* The luxury of John O'Niall is celebrated by the contemporary Irish bards, as totally inconceivable. His affectation of magnificence in dress, &c., was so great, that he is commemorated to this day, by the peasants of the North, as "Shane a Diomas," that is, John the Luxurious.

"Better desert to O'Donnell than perish in the lake," said one of the boatmen.

The boats were, at this moment, rubbing against each other with the lashing of the waves, and the occupants could scarce hear each other talk. The answer of the boatman was inaudible to O'Niall; but again the wailing sound which had been heard on the island, rose in redoubled strength, and the clapping of hands, and the noise, seemed to come from the gloom which enveloped the lake, right a-head of the boats.

"'Tis the Banshee," exclaimed the kerne who had first spoken. "'Tis the Banshee for the death of an O'Niall; in the name of St. Patrick make for the island."

"An' it be the Banshee," said O'Niall, "it howls for thyself;' and, stooping down, he seized a stone which was part of his boat's ballast. The rebellious boatmen had just turned the head of their curragh towards the strand, when the O'Niall raised himself to his feet, in the stern of his own boat, and discharging the stone with the strength of a giant at the craft of the deserters, he drove a plank out of its bottom. Another moment, and the boat filled—gave one lazy whirl, and disappeared for ever.

The other boatmen, who had till now lain upon their oars, would have returned to pick up their companions, had not O'Niall commanded them to proceed, and enforced his order with an oath, that the first who turned his boat, should be shot dead upon the spot. Fear overcame their desire to save their fellows, and the boats rowed off amid the yells of the wretches, as their strength gave way, and they sank to the bottom.

Not a word was spoken by the followers of O'Niall after the acting of this bloody scene, but each pulled his own in silence, or looked out to see if they were nearing the land. A few miles' sailing, and the rising of the moon, showed them the dark woods of the Antrim shore, and run aground upon the shelving sand-banks on the beach.

Here they left their boats, and waded to the dry land, hauling the curragh of O'Niall and his mistress along with them.

As soon as the chieftain landed, he set out along the beach, telling the lady to await his return, and was, in a short time, amongst the dark pines, within a little distance of Edenduff-carrick, when, uttering a low whistle, he was immediately joined by a kerne, dressed as were those in the boats.

"What is thy news?" asked O'Niall.

"The M'Quillans have made a hosting against the M'Donnells, in route, and the garrison of Edenduff-carrick, is nearly exhausted by the departure of the Scots to the fight," was the answer.

"It matters not; though Edenduff were defended only by a gray-haird crone, I may not lift hand against the Scots. My father's vassals have deserted me, and I must become a supplicant to Alexander Oge MacDonnell, except, indeed, I again bow my crest to the Sassanach which I am half inclined to do," said O'Niall.

"O'Niall, I am thy foster-father," said the kerne.

"Thou art! and what of that?"

"Then, as the sharer of thy father's bed and board, I counsel thee from trusting in the false Sassanach Sydney. Last night the banshee cried round Edenduff, and she never was heard but for the death of an O'Niall."

"I'the name of the patron apostle, am I never to have done with idle tales of the banshee? I warrant me thou art so filled with old wives' lore that thou wilt not follw me to M'Donnell."

"It were a hard case, my chief, when I should desert the dog of O'Niall, and that thou knowest well."

"Then bring the steeds to the creek, and we will start ere day-break."

The kerne signified his obedience, and disappeared into the woods.

Half an hour had scarcely elapsed ere he was again joined by his foster-father, leading a pair of gallant steeds, which he had no sooner delivered to the chieftain's followers, than he returned and brought a second pair, which procedure he continued until he had a steed for every individual in the group.

"Now," said he, turning to O'Niall, "the sooner we leave here we shall be all the safer, for the MacQuillans will notice the loss of their steeds, and we shall be detected ere we escape."

O'Niall assented to his proposition, and in a few minutes they were mounted and had turned their faces towards Clanhuboy.

The moon had arisen the next evening, ere O'Niall and his "following" had reached the castle of MacDonnell, in the hills of Clanhuboy, and the warder had taken his place upon its battlements for the night, when the prince of Tyrone rode up to the gate of the court yard. But he hardly directed his foster-brother to sound the horn which hung at the gate for admission, when a hunting party arrived, headed by Alexander Oge himself. As soon as O'Niall perceived the Scottish chieftain's approach, he despatched a follower to request an interview with him apart from their respective clansmen. This MacDonnell readily granted. O'Niall stated his circumstances, and spoke of their former alliance, and of him having released the son of Sorlebag, whom he had confined so long. MacDonnell promised him the succor of the Scots of Down and Antrim; and, in a few minutes, all the parties were seated in the banquetting hall of the Scotsman's castle. The feast had been disposed of and the wine cup circled gallantly, and all was mirth and rivalry, when the harmony was interrupted by a dispute between a clansman of O'Niall and one of the MacDonnells. The O'Niall had asserted that the wife of a chief of the clan MacDonnell had looked favorably upon Shane a Diomas. Shane himself was inflamed with wine, and asserted the truth of the statement of his clansman; MacDonnell retorted with bitter words, and O'Niall threw his steel gauntlet upon the table, until every thing upon it rang with the violence of the shock. The challenge was accepted—a general fight ensued, and when peace was restored, the boding of the banshee was fulfilled—Shane O'Niall was slain, and his head, severed from his body, was presented in a week by the Scot at Dublin Castle.

INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS IN IRELAND.

From the Dublin Tablet.

A great change is taking place in the midst of us, almost unobserved and unchronicled. As yet, neither the fact nor its importance appears to be generally appreciated—the fact that at length industry and thrift are making their way steadily into the homes of our poor, led in by little children, and wherever these good angels—indeed we might call them ministers of Providence—have been received, poverty already ceases to be wretchedness; the helpless are growing helpful.

It is a little history, which, if neither strange nor eventful, is yet full of interest for the thoughtful. It is one worth while conning over curiously—to be read backwards and forwards. There's a charm in it, though it relates but to the poor and simple; folk lore, if you will, but the man who is wise in interpretation, may see through it into the future, and be in a measure prepared for what is to come.

It will long be remembered what noble endeavors were made in many directions by members of all classes and persuasions in Ireland to come to the aid of this famine-stricken people. And surely not one of those great or good "deeds done in the days of shame" and woe ought to be forgotten, nor please Heaven, shall they, for they are recorded in the hearts of a proverbially tenacious-memoried people, and in the same lines with their saddest and deepest sufferings. Perhaps no better deed was done in those "bad times," than that of founding and conducting industrial schools, wherein the female children of the poor were taught to earn money-wages. While the laboring class, both in town and country, continued to subsist—all but exclusively—upon the potato, and that flourished, there was little or no want. The poorest cottier had his plot—an acre or half an acre of "garden;" "the pig paid the rent." Even in the towns, when employment failed the laborer, and he had nothing wherewith to buy a meal, he had only to send one of the children with a bag a few miles into the country, round about to the farmers' houses, and he could always count on a bagfull. Indeed, one of the first lessons taught by the Bhanithee to her child, was to run at once when it saw a beggar, and fill its little hands with potatoes to put in the bag. This, in fact, relieved the laborer from the necessity of unremitting exertion, required elsewhere to win daily bread, or to provide by forethought for the future. It was, unhappily, too true that the habits of industry and of thrift were very generally found wanting in the labor-class, as well in town as in country.

We do not, for it is needless to the argument, enter into the wider question—What part the state of the law of landlord and tenant had to do in bringing about this wretched condition of things? Ultimately, no doubt, it is all rightly chargeable upon the state of the law, which encouraged sloth, by the removal of motive to energy, and induced improvidence and excess by the denial of a right in the results of forethought and temperance: all, indeed, may be summed up as necessary correlatives to the relationship of landlordism and tenancy, as established by the land laws and by the same maintained. But immediately the potato was at the root of the poverty of the poor. Upon the famine's abating, the industrial movement by no means flagged. Its organization and guidance had fallen, mostly, into hands never idle—the most pushing people in, or rather, out of the world, whose motto is, "Think of rest, and work away," who have no resting place here below. In a single convent in Limerick, the good Sisters have been enabled to adopt and maintain on the produce of their own work two hundred orphan girls. In Cork, not only has British and foreign fancy-work been driven out of the home market, but an extensive trade in wool and crochet-work is being carried on with Britain, the colonies and America. The number of children there employed are to be counted by thousands. In Dublin, strange to say, the movement was late in being set on foot. It has as yet but a single school—"St. Joseph's Industrial Institute," Clarence street,—and that, though admirably conducted, and under the chief direction of the benevolent body who had a principal share in organising the movement in Cork, is yet, through want of the needful capital, unable to extend its operation proporionately to the requirements of the poor, even of the district in which it is situated. This, assuredly should not be, and we are confident, that once it becomes known, it will not long be.

The charm, however, lies in reading backward. It is told of a youth that upon being challenged to a duel, and invited to name his weapon, he responded, "I'll fight with anything, from a blunderbuss to a bodkin." Guns, pistols blunderbusses, we set aside, for the present at least, till after "the burning of the Treasury." Might we not win "our own again" by means of homelier weapons? See if we might not find the unguarded vital part of our worst enemies—those of our own household—and so end our woes, even "with a bare bodkin." Or a crochet-needle would do as well.

RELIGIOUS BIGOTRY—BOTH SIDES OF THE QUESTION.

From Gavan Duffy's Speech in Melbourne.

It has been insinuated indeed that Catholics ought to be deprived of political and religious liberty because they are denied in Catholic countries. This is intelligible ground to take but it means repealing the Emancipation Act, and, for my part, I would as soon sell my children to be slaves as allow them to live in a country where such a doctrine prevailed. But is it true that political and religious liberty are denied in Catholic countries? It is as true as that witches ride on broomsticks, that one Englishman can beat five Frenchmen, or any of the other fables of ignorance or prejudice. Pitt and Fox, Plunkett and Peel, answered it long ago. I have a tolerable familiarity with the present state of Europe, and I maintain that since the answers of these statements Catholic countries have continued to set the noblest example of religious liberty. Take Belgium, for example, the best governed country on the continent. There are more Protestants in Collingwood than in the entire kingdom, yet that Catholic people five and twenty years ago, selected a Protestant as their King, and endowed the clergy of the Protestant Church in the same manner as their own. Take Hungary—it is a Catholic country, yet the Hungarians placed Kossuth, a Protestant, in the highest office of State, and he declares the Catholic bishops were his warmest supporters. Take France—a quarter of a century ago the French set a memorable example of religious equality to the world. Take Poland—that Catholic country was the first to emancipate the Jews—an example which England has not followed to this very hour. There are Catholic countries which refuse civil and religious liberty; but why? Because they are governed by the old despotic system which prevailed at some time or other in every State in Europe. Is the fact of their being Catholic to account for it? America is Protestant, and she deals in Negro slaves; but is her Protestantism held answerable for that? She has twice decimated and plundered the Mormons for their religious opinions; does it follow that toleration is not permitted in Protestant countries? There are Catholic countries undoubtedly which refuse civil and religious liberty, but are there not Protestant countries which refuse them also? A Catholic is as ill treated in Sweden as a Protestant is in Naples; in Prussia, a Catholic is made as uncomfortable as a Protestant is in Austria. The Swiss Protestants have shown themselves as great tyrants as the Spanish Catholics. Even in this new world we have the same spirit, mitigated by the nineteenth century. The Church of England established a settlement at Canterbury, in New Zealand, and one of the fundamental rules forbade any person to attain political office who did not take the sacrament of that church. The Church of Scotland established a settlement at Otago, in New Zealand, and by its local laws no school is permitted to share the public grant for education which does not teach the catechism of the church. Look at the example England herself has set down to this very generation. Thirty years ago no Protestant Dissenter could sit in Parliament; it is but three years since he was admitted to the Universities. I had myself the pleasure of voting for the measure. He has still to pay church rates for the support of the establishment; and it is not a very long time since carting Quakers and burning the houses of Unitarians have ceased to be popular pastimes. These facts might teach us that there have been bigotry and cruelty wherever uncontrolled power existed, no matter to what creed it belonged. I decline to answer for the House of Bourbon or the House of Hapsburg; but I answer for the Catholics of Ireland, and I affirm they never denied civil and religious liberty. When you talk to an Irish Catholic of his creed being the symbol of persecution, and Protestantism the symbol of liberty, he may well think you mad. He or his ancestors never persecuted any one for religion's sake. In the reign of Queen Mary English Protestants fled to Dublin, and were sheltered in that Catholic city. In the reign of Queen Victoria a large number of Catholic constituencies elect Protestants as their chosen representatives. But in every generation for three hundred years, Irish Catholics have been robbed and oppressed, because they were Catholics; down to this hour, when they are compelled to support the richest church in the world for a handful of the population. It is realizing the fable of the wolf and the lamb to raise a cry of intolerance against those who have not inflicted but endured the pains of ascendancy. I have thought it my duty, gentlemen, to speak plainly and unequivocally on this subject; and I do not know myself if I would not have done so still more plainly and unequivocally if the bigotry had been that of Catholics against Protestants. I hate Catholic ascendancy and Protestant ascendancy alike, and while I breathe I will resist one and the other. I have been requested to answer a ludicrous charge made against me in a style and spirit worthy of Titus Oates, that I myself came to this country to promote sectarian triumphs. I cannot descend into the kennel, even to defend myself; let my life answer it. There are ten thousand Irish Protestants in this country, who were my contemporaries at home. You will find them at the bar, in the church, behind the counter, and in the workshop; let them answer it. Their opinion, whatever it is, will infallibly prevail in the end; and I am content to abide that verdict.

MODERN CIVILIZATION.

Dr. Brownson delivered his second lecture on Modern Civilization on the evening of the 12th at Hope Chapel. As our staff were present elsewhere on the evening in question, we are indebted to the Tribune for such notes as we present of the discourse.

Much of what was regarded as progress, Dr. Brownson questioned, as it was progress in the concrete only, and was the necessity for other changes in existing order to make it correspond with a previous change. The more remarkable progress manifested might be expressed by the term humanity—or philanthropy; the latter term he disliked, as it was a profession of an undesirable class of people—gentlemen who were lovers of humanity in the abstract, but great haters of men in particular—unless they chanced to be rogues or to have a black skin. This progress was manifested by the recognition of human rights. In ancient times there was no recognition of any rights by virtue of man's existence. The principle was the basis of true liberty, whether religious, civil, or political. It was the principle of the apostles. There was no regard among ancient nations for human life. The most enlightened were extremely cruel. The father could kill his child or his wife; and the creditor his debtor. Human sacrifices were common. But Christian law, which taught that every man had an immortal soul, and in the rights appertaining thereto all were equal before God, had infused into man the sentiment of humanity. This sentiment was first realized in the church when noble and ignoble, master and slave stood on the same ground of equality. This sentiment had spread into civil society, and had become an element in modern civilization, even in those countries which have but little regard to the teachings of our Lord. It was true that after the conquest of England by the Normans, a nation not more than half Christianized, the jurisprudence and laws of that country deteriorated, and were more cruel; yet during the past two hundred years there had been efforts made to ameliorate the penal code, and in some respects it had been carried to a contrary excess. Thus palaces were built for prisoners, who were better cared for, better fed and better clothed than the majority of the laboring classes in any country. In the provisions for the poor, too, paupers had been made. The ancient nations had no institutions for the aid of the poor, and this feature of progress did not develop itself until after the birth of Christianity, when hospitals were provided for the rich and poor, even in the time of the Roman Empire, and soon Europe was covered over with these institutions. But in those countries which had broken away from the Catholic faith there had been a retrograde movement in this respect. Poverty in England and America wasconsidreed very much in the light of a crime. The old New-England plan of giving out the support of the town poor to the lowest bidder was bad enough, but the plan of imprisoning them in poor houses, where they are taught to believe that they lack the elements of manhood, was worse. In Protestant countries, philanthropy expanded itself by building palatial prisons, so that those who were under the sentence of the law should suffer as little as possible. In Catholic countries, what one was struck with was the tenderness with which the poor were cared for.

In war, too, progress has been made. From ancient times, when prisoners were sold into slavery, or killed, we had reached a time when it was a principle to treat prisoners with respect, and on land to respect the rights of private property, through the influence of the pontiffs of the Church; and now the United States had taken the lead of all the European Governments except the Pontificial Government, to make the same principles apply to the sea as to the land. This accomplished, and war would soon become nothing but a duel between armed forces of nations, the folly of which would soon be seen, end it would die away, and peace would become the general order among nations. All of these things were good, but they had evil connected with them. So long as this progress was the result of Christian charity, which was a supernatural virtue, it worked supernatural effects; but during the past hundred and fifty years no small portion of the religious faith of the world was relapsing into the condition of the ancient Pagan religion. Since the peace of Utrecht, the English system had been gradually coming more in vogue in Europe, and that system was pure materialism, and this has grown even upon nations which had not entirely shaken off the Catholic faith. This materialism appeared not in the form of charity, but in the form of humanity—a natural sentiment—seeking, by means of State and civil legislation, to do what the Church had done by charity. But, carried away by this natural sentiment, the most dreadful revolutions had occurred. This sentiment, in its blindness, rushed to great extremes. It sympathized with the slave, forgetting the Constitution, and forgetting the security due the white as well as the black. We were now deluged with a watery sentimentality, while strong, manly feeling and energetic virtue, which could laud and defend itself, was hardly to be found. In the conclusion of his discourse, the lecturer spoke of the blind pursuit of wealth which, he stated, characterized our people. We needed lessons of religion to moderate our desires, and raise our affections from earth and to place them on things above.

Answers to Correspondents.

The following stanzas introduces a new contributor of promise:

PARTING MOMENTS.

On the green hillside, and the mountain's brow,
The golden sunlight lingered yet awhile;
The waving tree-top caught a radiant glow—
The mountain-stream flashed back its parting smile.

The mountain-stream, that down its rocky bed,
With fierce, wild energy, exulting rushed,
Breaking the stillness over nature spread,
With its wild music, when all else was hushed.

O, mountain-stream, that in thy onward course,
Dashing thy spray on the sweet wild flow'rs by,
Dost ever keep, unwearied by thy force,
Bear on thy waters my heart's wailing cry.

O, blessed sunlight, brightening Irish earth,
Linger awhile—let me drink in thy light;
For long my soul must pine in dreary death,
Ere thou shalt wake it from its starless night.

Ye fragrant gales that play around it now,
Waft to my soul the wild flow'rs balmy breath;
Ere ye again can cool my throbbing brow,
This heart may sleep the pulseless sleep of death.

Green hills and valleys of my native land,
Rich in old mem'ries and historic lore,
Bright rivers, mountains, tall, sublime and grand,
Shall I indeed behold you then no more.

I clasp the earth—a passionate embrace,
And burning kisses on the green turf press;
Hot, scorching tears bedew my pallid face—
My spirit faints in utter wretchedness.

Once more on these loved scenes I gaze around
The sun-lit valley, and the leafy dell,
Then while I sink, despairing on the ground,
My heart wails forth a bitter, wild farewell.

CERVA.

Here is a truthful, rollicking song for the Holidays:

THE UNITED AMERICAN.

By tyrants driven o'er the seas,
The pioneers of nations;
Our fathers joined in unity
For human exaltation.

CHORUS—Then let no British bigotry
Its blows and curses bandy.
We're united Americans
And Yankee Doodle dandy!

Hail! to the noble Democrats
Who raised aloft our eagles,
And hunted out the royal rats
And flogged the British beagles.

CHORUS.

'Neath banner broad, the stars of God,
Still hand in hand as brothers,
We'll worship at no royal nod,
Nor persecute each other.

CHORUS.

Behold! above the earth and sea,
Our eagles proudly soaring,
And happy homes and altars free
From British lions' roaring.

CHORUS.

Tho' English boors now sweep our shores,
In brutal force confiding;
We'll give John Bull a stomach-full,
And back him with cow-hiding.

CHORUS.

And as our fathers did before,
We'll whip the British handy,
And teach them what it is to fish
With Yankee doodle dandy.

CHORUS.

Shall Orange slaves and K. N. knaves
Repeal the Revolution?
No! By the bones of Washington.
Hurrah for the Constitution!

CHORUS.

'Gainst every home and foreign foe
We've bayonets when we need 'em;
Glory to Jackson and Munroe!
"Extend the bounds of freedom!"

CHORUS.

OLD SAM.

DECLINED.—An "Irish Peasant's" lines, addressed to the Sisters of Mercy, on the death of one of their community, are praiseworthy and commendable for the devotion exhibited, both in the choice and treatment of the subject; but are scarcely of sufficient literary merit to do full justice to the author's exalted feelings.

"R."—Your Christmas Song, beginning

There was a time—there was a time
When our hearts were young and gay, is too palpably an echo of a couple of well-known songs. The "Emigrant's Farewell" is much better, though unequal. A couple of stanzas will shew that "R." is not devoid of poetic feeling and expression:

Her step lightly sounds as the young roe that bounds
At morn o'er the heath on the mountain—
Her smile pure and sweet as the sunbeams that meet
Aurora's first glance on the fountain.

How sweet would life be with a maiden like thee,
To love by the shores of the West,
When the sunset awhile would illumine thy smile;
Then sink on thy sweet bosom to rest.

"T. W. N."—Be not too anxious to appear in print. If, as you say, you are a boy, a few years' careful study will concentrate and render valuable the talent which you may possess.

"The old land."—This has the germ of a good lyric in it, but the spirit is diluted. "Crinoline" to the air of "All round my hat!" Why, friend, this is a perfect war-whoop.

Editor "Irish News." NEW-YORK, Monday, Dec. 22nd, 1856.

Dear Sir—The regrets expressed by Captain Rynders during the delivery of his admirable, appropriate and effective speech at the Tabernacle on Saturday evening, that he couldn't render the peculiar definition of the term Filibuster, suggests to me, that it may be worth your while to publish the following one, which I read somewhere several years ago:—

When Ponce de Leon discovered Florida, the French built a fort. Subsequently the Spanish captured it and butchered its defenders. The French were then so busily engaged at war elsewhere, that they had to overlook the outrage, but a Capt. Gourge prepared a private expedition and took revenge. It sailed from Cape Finisterre—then Finibuster.

The French are apt to change n into l, as Menomine into Melomine. Sailors are wont to be called from their Port of departure. Hence the term Fillbuster.

Yours ever, SAM SEBASTIAN.

A HUNGRY PUBLISHER.—The errand boy from the printing office of John A. Gray having been hurriedly dispatched with revised proofs to Messrs. Mason & Co., Park Row, and taking his coat, ran off at the top of his speed. Arriving at Mr. Mason's office, he handed the package to that gentleman, and left. When he was half way back, however, he discovered that he had handed him his dinner, which was in his coat-pocket, in place of the proofs: and returning to correct his mistake, Mr. Mason almost choking with laughter, said, "Mr. Gray must have thought me very hungry, to send me my dinner all the way from Jacob-street!"

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1856.

ADESTE FIDELES—CHRISTMAS MEMORIES.

The sweetest, divinest festival in the Calendar has come. The opening beauties of the Spring, with the clear streams, deepened by the snows and rains of the vanished Winter, and the fresh songs of the glad birds waking out of their sleep and shelterless sorrow, bring with them no brighter day. The rich sunshine that steals the perfume of violet and rose, to send it back in subtle currents all through nature—fills the calm lake with diamonds and sapphires—makes the noon gorgeous with golden fruit and emerald foliage, and gives to morn and evening such a wealth of serenities, coloring, and harmonies—this rich sunshine dawns not on a day more grand or holy.

The Indian summer—the genial, translucent, favorite season of this city—with its famous tapestry of burnished leaves, the dreamy azure of its skies, the graphic outline of its mountains, the new sense of manhood it imparts, the sparkling blushes, and the world of brisk, hopeful, gay activities it calls to light—the Indian summer has no day more healthful to the heart—no day more fruitfully suggestive of good thoughts and purposes—no day more luminously evocative of old affections, faces, and remote scenes—no day more spiritually joyous.

Memory, heart, and intellect—even with those who who have been most wearied, wounded, and oppressed—even with those who have most acutely felt the thorns that beset this earth's pilgrimage—in the beautiful serene light of this season of love, revive. The shadows that darken the mirror of existence—shadows which from misfortune, or selfishness, or the ruins of early hopes descend—pass off in the glory which rests over Bethelehem. To all eyes—even to those that have been made sore with weeping—the consoling star is visible. To every ear come the sublime tidings of the attendant Choir of the Nativity, throbbing through a night of eighteen hundred years, and earth and heaven unite in one glad anthem.

Loved features that have been hid from us all the year, smile again upon us. Scenes which have been to us all this time past but as the remnants of a dream, return to us with the freshness and youth of some fair island just born of the sea. And even with the dead that are dear to us, our sympathies renew themselves with the force and purity of the waters which in the dews of the Autumn tumble down the face of Mangerton to the graves of Muckruss.

In the midst of the thanksgivings and festivities of this Christmas, it is an exquisite joy to us—a joy above all other joys—that our brother, Devin Rielly, is to have an evening devoted to his memory, and the service of the child and widow, who in their prayers and loving recollections, keep alive the virtues and the loss of the Departed, as well as the duties we all owe his character, his genius, and the relics of his household.

On Monday night, the 29th, in the Broadway Tabernacle, John Mitchel—who loved Rielly as no other comrade was ever loved before—speaks of his Life and Death. It is one of the holiest duties, as it will be one of the most fruitful charities of this season, for us to be there. All should be there. In the name of the Festival we celebrate—the Festival that brought peace to men of good will, to Shepherds and to Kings—all should be there.

AMERICANS TO THE RESCUE!

The meeting on last Saturday night, in aid of the Liberating army of Nicaragua, did honor to the citizens of New-York. It was a glorious gathering. The people were there in thousands. A gallant officer, General Ward Burnett, appropriately occupied the chair. The resolutions were well considered, effectively expressed, and to the point. They assert for the movement, of which General Walker is the military chief, a national consequence. In this they do not exaggerate. They simply characterize with truthfulness an epoch pregnant with vital advantages to America, or with grievous difficulties and calamities, as the voice of the nation so determines it. The speeches of the chivalrous and accomplished Chairman, of Generals Green and Wheat, of Captain Rynders and Mr. Oaksmith, fully expressed the spirit of the occasion, and did justice to the cause which is now driven to bay in Nicaragua by the savage blood-hounds of Carrera. On the whole, no public demonstration could have been more earnest and enthusiastic; and Messrs. Oaksmith, Fabens, Heiss, Alexander C. Lawrence, and the other gentlemen of the Executive Committee, have ample reason to congratulate themselves upon the success which crowned their generous labors.

WALKER'S DICTIONARY—A FEW WORDS FROM THE SPANISH ABOUT CENTRAL AMERICA.

General Walker is no lawless intruder, as the Gaceta of Guatemala, and the echoes of that press in this city, assert. It is well known he entered Nicaragua to co-operate with the Democratic party of that country, in their patriotic effort to conclude permanently the civil war which has been raging there for years. The Democratic party invited him to co-operate. Acting on their invitation, he did nothing more than what Lord Cochrane did in Chili and Peru, what General Devereux, with his Irish Lancers, did in Venezuela, what Byron did in Greece, or Lafayette did here.

Shortly after his appearance in Nicaragua, immediately upon the surprise of Granada by him, the fierce quarrel which the Democrats and Serviles had so long conducted, was brought to a generous and honorable settlement. A treaty was signed by the representatives of the two parties. The first clause declares hostilities at an end, and that peace and friendship is established between the two armies, those of Corral and Walker. A Provisional Government is inaugurated. Patricio Rivas is nominated Provisional President for fourteen months, or for a less period, if the President and a full Cabinet of Ministers should decide otherwise.

The salutary effect of this arrangement was soon visible. It was instantaneous almost. Peace pervaded the entire country. The arts and fruits of peace everywhere multiplied. Hardly an instance of disorder occurred. There was perfect contentment. For many a day, Nicaragua had not been so tranquil, prosperous, and happy. It was the only time for years, that the poor natives of Nicaragua—a people in whose veins no Spanish blood exists, and who compose four-fifths at least of the entire population—could securely rest in their little homesteads, and cultivate their sugar-cane, plantains, and frijoles. Contrary to the practice of the military chiefs who had incessantly compelled them to leave their homes and fight for one savage despotism or another against their will, General Walker left the native population at liberty to contribute or withhold military service to the State. He pressed no man into the army.

The result was a perfect confidence in the Government, of which, though not nominally, he was still the head. Had it not been for the jealousies of the neighboring States—jealousies envenomed by the agents of England and France—had it not been for the wanton invasion of her territory by Costa Rica on the South, Guatemala and San Salvador on the North—a remorseless brigandage which England and France have notoriously countenanced, instigated, and with arms, war-ships, and all the power of their Press sustained—had it not been for this, Nicaragua would have been to-day one of the most fortunate and flourishing Republics in the world.

Costa Rica led the way. Of the initiative in this bloody business—she is the guilty author. She it was who raised the deadly war-cry—Death to all North Americans—words now written in red letters on the allied banners as they sway to and fro against the walls of Rivas and Granada. Death to all North Americans! It has been no idle cry. The fifteen American citizens massacred at Virgin Bay in April last, whilst quietly and inoffensively pursuing their duties as employees on the Transit Route; the assassination of the Rev. Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Lawless, both citizens of America and both strict neutrals in Nicaragua: the wholesale slaughter on the island of Ometepee, where sick and wounded men, women, and children were hacked to pieces with the knives of the butchers who have been inflamed with this fiendish yell of Death to all North Americans; these events have told the world that it is no vain boast, no idle cry. Humanity demands that the American people—that the American Government—should promptly interpose. National pride dictates it. National interests of the weightiest consequence render it a positive necessity. Men begin now to ask, how came it that whilst Greytown was bombarded for an insult to an American officer, the cities of those remorseless bandits who sack the houses and spill the blood of American citizens in Nicaragua have been left untouched. Men ask, how comes it that a special Commissioner is despatched to Panama to inquire into the murder and robbery of California passengers by the police and rabble of that city, whilst the American Minister to Nicaragua is withdrawn, and the interests of this country are deprived of a representative where those interests are in imminent danger, and the American flag has no more respect paid it than if it were a piece of pirate bunting. Heavens! To think that this glorious flag, with all the splendor of the Heavens stamped upon it, should have lost the reverence due to it, and the inviolability it once possessed. President Pierce appears to have ignored the magnificent promises, which, standing on the top-most step of the Capitol, the day of his Inauguration, he made on behalf of the Stars and Stripes, and the citizenship it symbolizes. We are forced to say—for it is our honest conviction—that had English subjects been dealt with as the American citizens of Nicaragua have been, Carrera would have had to express his contrition not only in the most penitent phrases, but in hard cash—in piles of large Spanish dollars on the counter down—for his mistake.

Aside, however, from considerations of humanity, patriotism, national pride and policy—the commercial interests, the territorial integrity, the geographical unity of these States demand that the Federal Government should vigorously interpose in Nicaragua. If the Panama Railroad is insecure—if the lives and properties of American citizens passing over it, are held to be in imminent peril—so much so that the Press, the Senate and the Cabinet debate the necessity of the military occupation of the road—a thousand times more precarious is the Nicaraguan route to California and elsewhere along the Pacific, and a thousand times—especially under present circumstances—is it incumbent on the authorities at Washington to provide for its safety. Should Carrera succeed in mastering the enemies of his truculent power in Nicaragua, there's an end to the safety, the comparative safety even, of the Nicaraguan route—unless, indeed, the Government at Washington anticipate his depredations and butcheries, and drive him back to Guatemala, with the vultures on his track.

The conservative spirit of this noble city should see that the National resources be not withheld from Nicaragua until it be too late, or the prodigious mischief of which Carrera is capable, has been consummated. Infinitely better to anticipate the mischief. Infinitely better to wrench the blazing torch from the hand of this wild ruffian of Santa Rosa—this cut-throat of the children of Los Altos—before he has fired the fabric which it has cost so princely a fortune to build up. A road over which nearly three thousand passengers travelled every month, and millions on millions of dollars, and millions of pounds of freight have been transported every year, is worth preserving by the merchants of America. No class of the community, in fact, are so vitally interested in this Nicaragua question, as the business men of New-York. The planting of American society and laws in Texas, has largely contributed to the prosperity of this towering city, and what Texas has done for New-York, Nicaragua will likewise do, if the citizens of New-York only stand by General Walker, and the movement of which he is the intrepid chief.

DEATH OF DOCTOR PUSEY.

A late steamer from Europe brought us intelligence of the death of one of the most celebrated theologians of our time, Edward Bouverie Pusey. Since the days of the Reformation, no revolution created so startling an attention, and so anxious a solicitude as that initiated by the so-called "Oxford Theology," of which Dr. Pusey was the recognised founder, and by which the tenets of the Church of England were shaken. He was the apostle of a theology that invaded the doctrines of a Church based on the teaching of Luther, and the practical beastiality of Henry the Eighth; and which, established by law as the religion of the British Empire, confers upon the British Sovereign the title of "Defender of the Faith."

The principles enunciated by him, in conjunction with Dr. Newman, have become the text-book of a new sect, that breaking from the Church of England, barely stopped short of a complete entrance into the Church of Rome. The influence of the studies undertaken for the purpose did not end thus: for Dr. Newman became a thorough Catholic, and the party heretofore jointly inspired by him, adopted the name of his coadjutor to designate its religious feeling in contradistinction to the various doctrines and doctrinarians of the time.

In illustration of the force with which the Puseyites made inroads on the Established Church, and as an identification of the sect with the famous Oxford professor, we call to mind a passage of Richard Lalor Shiel's speech, made in the House of Commons, in the Springof '44, reviewing the course of the Government officials in the Irish State Trials of the previous year. In a vigorous passage, referring to the distinctions made by the Government between Catholic and Protestant, he reverted to the theological disaffection among the latter. He desired to inquire on which side of the Tweed was "Protestant Truth" to be found. He looked in Perth, on the North for it. On the South, he looked into Oxford. What did he find? "It is Calvinistic," he said, "in the North—it is Armenian in the South: it is dressed in a black gown and a white band in the North—in the South it is episcopally enthroned, mitred and crosiered, and arrayed in all the pomp of pontifical attire. On the North it betrays its affinity to Geneva; on the South it exhibits a strong family resemblance to that Babylonian lady, toward whom, under the auspices of Doctor Pusey, its filial affection is beginning to return."

Shiel was a careful observer and brilliant compiler of the spirit of public movements. He understood well the points to which he spoke. The divisions in the Established Church, to which he with sarcastic truth pointed, were initiated in 1834 by the first publication of the now famous "Tracts for the Times," issued by Dr. Pusey and Dr. Newman. In these Tracts the writers, with great research and learning, clear eloquence and most astute, if not subtle reasoning, avowed and supported a theory of Church-worship, having for its fundamental basis the doctrines of Apostolical succession. They propounded on these grounds a faith in the efficacy of the sacraments of the Church—not inferior to that held by the Church of Rome. Doctrines, so utterly at variance with those recognized by the English Church, could not fail to awaken an almost simultaneous outcry of heresy to the faith "Defended" by the Sovereign of Great Britain. The bitterest charge—that of attempting to "Romanize the Protestant Church"—was brought against him, and in 1843 he was suspended from preaching for four years. Against this, of course, the Regius Professor of Hebrew, and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, protested; and has at various times essayed fruitlessly to prove his adherence to the doctrine and worship of the English Church. Since Dr. Newman left him and the half-way theory, for the full faith of the Roman Catholic Church, Dr. Pusey has acted rather more on the defensive, being, it is stated, somewhat alarmed at the large accession of the alumni of Oxford to the Catholic faith.

Dr. Pusey has always contended and protested against the adoption of his name as the watchword of the party his learning and great ability created.

REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

As bursts the pent-up fire from the crater of Ætna, again the flame of revolution ascends from Sicily. In '48, from every church-spire in the land, the pealing tocsin sent forth the summons to arms, and silenced the boisterous carousal of the Neapolitan bandits, who kept watch over the tomb of Italian liberty in the beautiful city of Palermo. Sicily, awaking from her long slumber, burst her chains like bands of flax. There was a red sign in the heavens—Kings saw it and trembled—the People recognised it and took courage! The uprising of Sicily, the smallest and weakest of the down-trodden Nationalities—of Sicily going forth with its sling and pebble, to meet the Royal monster—shook the old Dynastic houses of Europe to their foundations. The thunder rolling from the Calabrian coast reverberated along the banks of the Seine. Paris was soon in arms, the cunning old King was besieged in his palace, and the surrender of the Tuilleries and the abdication of the crown demanded from the bristling barricade of the Rue St. Denis. A pause—a moment of wild suspense—and disguised Royalty, in a stage coach, is on its way to the regal almshouse of Claremont. There is a blazing throne in the streets of Paris, the blouses are in the House of the Bourbon, and victory crowns the Eagles of the People!

Late accounts from Europe report Sicily in successful revolt. She has given a second sign, which, coming from such a quarter, is ominous for the patched-up peace of Europe and the unobserved Treaty of Paris.

It now remains to be seen whether the Allied fleet will carry out their threatened demonstrations against Naples, or repair to Palermo for the preservation of law and order in Sicily. We believe the menacing attitude of the Allies against the royal-keeper of Neapolitan dungeons, the crowned leader of the ruthless Lazzaroni, was mere show. The broadsides of the British and French fleets were never destined to burst the prison-doors of Naples. When the final struggle comes in Europe, the Governments of France and England—with their Generals and Admirals, Tricolors and Union-Jacks—and all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of war, will be found on the side of Tyranny and against the People.

GEORGE STEERS.

We see it announced that the master-piece of the great naval architect of our time, the Adriatic, will be ready for her trial trip on New-Year's day. It is meet that a fresh year of enterprise and action should be inaugurated by the baptism of the great child of the forest and the mine, which, impressed with the genius of the ship-wright, will represent to other lands the physical strength, the intellectual beauty, and the commercial spirit of this.

What Pugin was to church architecture, George Steers was to these commercial citadels that stud the sea.

We understand that early in January the career of George Steers will be made the subject of a public discourse by William Ross Wallace. The theme is certainly a noble one, full of instruction and suggestiveness. The position held by the lamented ship-builder in relation to the spreading enterprise of the city, will attract a vast number desirous to be instructed in the details of a career which has become linked for ever with the commercial and naval history of the country. That Mr. Wallace will do the subject full justice we cannot doubt. His enthusiasm, the documents at his command, and his well-known eloquence, guided and sustained by that nationality which so distinctively mark that gentleman's poems and orations, must combine to render his lecture a complete success.

The poet who so bravely sung of the advent of Freedom on earth in his "Liberty Bell" of Philadelphia, is well qualified to chant a dirge over one who held the freedom of the sea.

Letter from Thomas Francis Meagher.

IRISH NEWS OFFICE, NEW-YORK, Dec. 20, 1856.

MY DEAR SIR:—At the last moment, I find it out of my power to attend the meeting at the Tabernacle. This I deeply regret. From the outset I have heartily stood by and supported the cause of Constitutional Republicanism in Nicaragua, The prominent columns of the paper I edit, week after week, give ineffaceable evidence of this. Of that cause Gen. Wm. Walker is the pilgrim and pioneer. In his bright successes he has had my congratulations. For his administrative labors, as he brought back peace and impartial stability to the beautiful and fruitful country, for whose regeneration his courage and sagacity were summoned into action, my words of commendation were not wanting.

Weak as they were, in a legitimate and generous and right noble cause, I did not hesitate, but was prompt to utter, publish and promulgate them. Those words are upon the record. Whatever be the event, they cannot be effaced. Whatever be the event, I would not withdraw them. Now that American Republicanism in Nicaragua is in peril—that intrigue strives incessantly with malignant tact and ingenuity to subvert, and a rabble barbarism, with a remorseless spirit of extermination assails, hems it in, and would drown it in a deluge of blood—conscience, justice, magnanimity insist upon my being its sympathizer, friend and advocate.

Adversity alienates no good cause from me. In the cowardly cry which now-a-days in this enlightened age—this age when materialism predominates to the profanation, the exclusion and ostracism of all that is chivalrous and beneficent, when all that is chivalrous and beneficent is beaten down, consigned to dungeons, or choked upon the scaffold—in this cowardly cry, with a peremptory protest, I refuse to join. With me, what is wrong becomes no right—nor do I submissively succumb to or tolerate it—because it soars, triumphs, and enthrones itself in imperial impunity above the world.

Italy—radiant, beautiful, divinely gifted—is a captive. Austrian bayonets precipitate themselves upon her from the Alps. The bayonets of Napoleon lock her in upon the South. Dukes of Tuscany and Kings of Piedmont, with their delusive programmes of Reform, distract, factionize, and paralyze her regenerative intellect within. Despite of the messages with which the Court of Naples have been menaced—despite the English fleet wavering about the Calabrian coast—despite of the French fleet lying under orders at Toulon—the Bourbon of Vesuvius has his lazzaroni knife upon the Roman heart. Italy is down. Down, say the European press. But, up or down, I am, as ever, the student of her history, the worshipper of her genius, the postulant for her freedom.

Hungary is down. Buda is no longer the citadel on which the proud families of an ancient nationality concentrate. The spies, the soldiery and hangmen of Vienna have made it their nest and bivouac, and Francis Joseph, Emperor of all the Austrias, rides through it and tramples on it as the Goth did once through the cornfields and vineyards of fair Lombardy. A suburban outcast, struggling for his daily bread, somewhere, somehow, in an humble cottage on the skirts of London, lives the man, who with his heart and genius raised the war for liberty in Hungary, and as the champion of that cause received here with a tumultuous enthusiasm, the welcome of the People, the Municipalities, the Militia, and the Senate.

Hungary is down. So say the European press. So the American press reiterate. But still I am for Hungary—for its exoneration, by arms, from the rule of Austria—for its recognition as a European nation, and its immutable stability as such—and for ever and a day, for better or for worse, I am for Kossuth, Hungary, and St. Stephen.

And there is Ireland. Ireland, too, is down. Down, as Hugh O'Neil would have blushed and burned to his heart to have seen it. Down, as Swift with his ruthless satire would have never let it come to. Down, as Grattan with all his gorgeous rhetoric about ish jurisprudence, and the fatality of French principles, would have never suffered it to come to. Down, as Fitzgerald, Wolfe Tone, Emmett—all rising from their graves, wherever they may be, and nameless though they be, would have covered their heads in their cold white shrouds—receding from the dull aspect, and shaken their spectral hands against it. Still for Ireland. Down as she is—with Queens, judges, journalists, and the world to the contrary saying so—I am for Ireland. Still am I, with all these adverse circumstances and consequential lecturing and logic, a devoted friend of Ireland; an inplacable enemy to those who would soothe her into a forgetfulness and forgiveness which in an ignominious tameness would obliterate her memory, her vengeance, her traditional hope and insular ambition.

This is all I write—it is enough. Not enough to elucidate and vindicate the cause, in the name, and for the prosperous consummation of which you are assembled. Yet enough—enough I have written—and at this vital crisis in American history I break through the silence I have heretofore observed, and assert that I represent thousands upon thousands of Irishmen in America, and I and they are with the gallant fellows who thus mght vindicate with steel and fire the supremacy of American laws, interests, enterprise, and manhood—and their political predominance on the Nicaraguan Isthmus—a predominance on which depends the commercial consequence and territorial inviolability of these United States.

With sincere esteem,

Believe me, my dear Sir,

Your faithful friend and servant,

THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

CHRISTMAS EVE IN TASMANIA—THE LADY OF THE LAKE.

Christmas in the middle of August! It is hard for any one to believe it who from the dawn of childhood has known the blessed day by the white robe it wears, and the holly and ivy wreath which with its glossy dark-green glory crowns it. Christmas in the middle of August! It is hard for any one to believe it who has looked out at midnight from his window, and in the solitary street, knee-deep in snow, has seen the Waits, in shaggy great-coats and mufflers, going through their pilgrimage from door to door, disturbing the reign of the silent stars with lame and melancholy music. Christmas in the middle of August! It is hard for any one to believe it, who has spread crumbs on the window-sill for the poor robin who has perched upon it from the shelterless snow without; who has heard the song of—

The Wren! The Wren!
The king of all birds,
On St. Stephen's day
He was caught in the furze;

and has given the merry, ragged young vagabonds who carried the wren in his nest, on the top of a wattle, a handfull of pence for the sake of old times, songs, and costumes. Christmas in the middle of August! It is hard for him to believe it, who from boyhood, year after year, as the Festival of the Nativity came round, and long before the sun had turned to silver the leafless trees, the hushed waters, and all the pale ruins of the Autumn, has listened to the echoes of the Hymn of Bethlehem rolling through the shadows and white aromatic clouds of Chapel or Cathedral, and in the mellowed light circling the Altar beheld the reflection of the glory which shone above the Shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night.

Yet, hard as it is for some of us in these Northern regions to believe, it comes to pass. In the beautiful island of Tasmania—away off in the solitude of the South Pacific—Christmas-day is crowned with roses; and fruit and flowers, and all the beautiful things born of the sun and earth are laid at the feet of Him to whom the gold, frankincense, and myrrh of Kings were once brought from the glowing East. On that glad day—on that day of good tidings of great joy—it is Midsummer in Tasmania. No cold wind rushes through the deep forests. No storm gathers on the mountains which lift themselves abruptly from the plains. The broad lakes which send abundance of sweet waters gurgling and bubbling from the summit of those mountains, reflect in their bright calmness the towering pines which shelter, and the dark close walls of the dwarfish tea-tree which girdle them. Far below in their breathless depths is seen the wing of the wild duck, the native cormorant, or the pelican, passing from shore to shore, and in their solitary freedom restlessly shifting their haunts. On the sparkling sands—sands which the Bushmen tell you are thick with diamonds, so glittering are the grains—the black snake basks in the sunshine, or among the shrubs and stones which fringe them, lurks for the bronzed lizard gliding close to the ambuscade. The warm valleys, musical with the rippling rivulet which cools the air and keeps the rich mould green about it, look beautiful and blissful as though the Golden Age, redolent with the acanthus and Assyrian spikenard, had visited the earth once more. Flashing through the aisles and arches of the woods, the crimson-crested forests fill the air with rainbow-hues. All over the island, from Asbestos hill to where Cape Pillar towers above the terrible surges eternally beating at its base, it is a day full of beauty, fruitfulness, all the richest melodies of nature, and the brightest living things that anywhere bless the plenteous earth.

On such a radiant vocal Christmas-day, five years ago, my home was in the central mountains of that sunny island of Tasmania. I was the tenant of a little cottage, built of timber—stringy bark—cut from the forest, on the skirt of which, fronting a noble lake the cottage stood. It was Lake Sorel.

"After climbing," says Mitchel, "full two thousand feet, we stand at one moment on the brink of the steep mountain, and behold the plain of Ross far below; the next minute, instead of commencing our descent into a valley on the other side, we are on the edge of a great lake, stretching at least seven miles to the opposite shore, held in here by the mere summits of the mountain-range, and brimming to the very lips of the cup or crater that contains it. A cutting of twenty-five feet in depth would, at this point, send its waters plunging over the mountain to form a new river in the plains of Ross. At another part of its shore, to the northwest, a similar canal would drain it into the Lake river which flows along the foot of the mountains on that side. As it is, the only outlet is through Lake Crescent and the Clyde; and so it comes to fertilize the vale of Bothwell, and bathe the roots of our trees at Nant Cottage. No lake on earth is more beauteous than Sorel. Not so be-rhymed as Windermere is this Antarctic lake; not so famous in story as Regillus or Thrasymene; in literature, as Como or Geneva, is our lake of the Southern Woods. An unbroken continent of mighty forest clasps us round here. On the the north frowns the peak called Cradle Mountain, with its gray precipices rising out of the rich foliage—one peak merely of the Great Western tier, rising not more than a thousand feet from the lake, but almost four thousand above the sea. Opposite, and farther off beyond the Crescent Lake, rises the grand Table Mountain. Nowhere gleams and ripples purer, glossier water, mirrowing a brighter sky. Nowhere does the wild duck find a securer nest. The snow-white swan—that "on St. Mary's Lake floats double, swan and shadow"—floats not more placidly, nor flings on the water a more graceful reflection from her stately neck, than the jet-black, proud-crested swan of these Antarctic waters."

The position and appurtenances of the little cottage on the brink of this lonely, glorious lake, the true bright pencil of my true-hearted, nobly-gifted friend has thus described:—

"At the head of a quiet bay, or deep curve of the lake, facing one of the most glorious scenes of fairy-land, with the clear waters rippling at its feet, with a dense forest around and behind it, Meagher has built his cottage. A little wooden jetty runs out some yards into the lake; and at anchor, near the end of the jetty, lies the Speranza, a boat built at Hobart Town, and hauled up here, over mountains, through swamps and forests, a distance of eighty-five miles, by six bullocks."

This Speranza was the Lady Lake.

THOMAS DAVIS.

A SKETCH.

Look at that young man. He is about the middle height; his movements are quick, and indicate the nervous, sanguine temperament. His shoulders are stooped. He carries the habits of the study about him in the streets, and his brain is ever bent over and ahead of his body. As he paces onward, with quickness and intent, it would seem that the legs strove to overtake that something which is passing through his mind. His dress is not over-elegant or careful. Get a glimpse at his face and you at once perceive that energy, love, firmness and devotion are stamped there. My friend, Doctor Redfield, the physiognomist, would tell you that great force and affection beamed from that young man's mouth and chin; that strong passion and vigor lay there, and that ostentation played no part in his life-drama; that the nose indicated intellect, and the eyes versatility, activity and penetration of thought, and, were the hat off, his forehead would present a striking combination of these various faculties and powers. Follow him, if you will, and ere you have left him you will have visited—the workshop of the artisan, where he talked of Irish oak for furniture—the studio of the artist, to whom he has rapidly and brilliantly suggested and grouped a picture from Irish history—the Galleries of the Royal Hibernian Academy, where he has awakened new beauties in the painted imaginations of Danby, the chivalric groups of Maclise, or the portraits of Burton—the Library of Trinity College, where he has consulted an old manuscript and fixed a date—the Museum of the Irish Academy, where he has met Doctor Petrie and with him inspected some newly dug up Danish or ancient Irish relic—the Committee-room of the Repeal Association, where he threw new and friendly light upon some subject of angry debate. Probably he has led you to his editorial room, where he has corrected a handful of proof-sheets—visited half a dozen bookseller's shops and called on William Elliot Hudson, to hear him play over an arrangement of some glorious old Irish airs, which he had recovered from a blind piper in the wilds of Connamara or the glens of Munster.

Aye to all these places, and many more, will this young man, with the bent shoulders and eager face, lead you; and in all will he exhibit the extensive resources of his intellect in bright, happy suggestions, and from all will he bear away some lesson to be acted on, which other eyes are blind to, and to which other ears are deaf.

In the evening, at MacNevin's house probably, he will meet his literary and political friends, the nucleus of the party afterwards known as "Young Ireland," and suggest to them how best they may supply the wants of Irish Literature, or instigate the life of Irish Manufactures and Art, by pointing out the exigencies of the one and the necessities of the other, as observed by him in his day's inspection. Here Parliament will be reviewed, party questions discussed, an Irish policy settled, wit flashed, and the young man with stooped shoulders and the eager face, will perambulate the streets homewards, the old Irish air ringing through his brain and almost mastering his limbs, until he has found a translation in words of the meaning and melody, which he writes out with little correction, and in next Saturday's Nation we find a "Lament for the Milesians," or a "Fanny Power," with the well-known signature of "The Celt."

And that young man is "the Celt?" Aye, that young man! Would you know more of him?—Listen:

Thomas Osborne Davis was born in the year 1814, at Mallow, in the County of Cork, Ireland. The scenery by which the child is surrounded fills the fancy of the man. We receive impressions then as we do the letters of the alphabet, and they are alike imperishable in our memories; and alike capable of as great variety of grouping and suggestiveness under the guidance of Fancy in the one and experience in the other. The scenes of Davis's childhood were well calculated to add to his natural abilities all that was chivalrous, beautiful and national. In his poem entitled "The Rivers," he calls the locality of his birth and childhood "The Eden of Ireland." Characterizing his native Munster Blackwater and its scenery, in contradistinction to the river of the same name which flows through Ulster, he has these fine verses:—

"— far kinder the woodlands of rich Convamore,
And more gorgeous the turrets of saintly Lismore;
There, the stream, like a maiden
With love overladen,
Pants wild on each shore.

"Its rocks rise like statues, tall, stately and fair,
And the trees, and the flowers, and the mountains, and air,
With Wonder's soul near you
To share with, and cheer you
Make Paradise there."

Within a circle of ten or a dozen miles round the cradle-home of Davis, the air is thick with lay and legend, here hanging like a tattered banner over the castle of the O'Keeffes at Dromagh—here muttering through the venerable Abbey of Buttevant, or whining, dirge-like, through the ruins of the Augustinian Monastery at Ballybeg. Yon, Kanturk lifts its remnants of castellated antiquity, and west of Buttevant the ruined castle of Liscarrol has many a crimson tale of the civil wars.

Is there any doubt but that the youth rebuilt those ruins in his imagination, besieged or defended them, fought all their battles, and carried with him into manhood and his public life the victories and glories of his fancy? no doubt, they haunted him like, as Shelley says—

"The echoes of an ante-natal dream."

In addition to the liberal teaching of the rocks, streams, woods, mountains and ruins, Davis received a good education and entered Trinity College, Dublin. Here he read much, devoured books of great variety, and shelves-full outside of the College course. He received no distinction and had but a "moderate reputation for high ability of any kind." "He was not a dull, plodding, blockhead premium-man," says Mitchel. But, says Mr. Wallis, a nearly friend and associate, "His powers were like the nucleus of an embryo star: uncompressed, unpurified, flickering and indistinct. He carried about with him huge loads of what other men—most of them statists and logicians—had thought proper to assert; but what he thought and felt himself he did not think of putting forward."

Thus he continued reading, feeling, and thinking in silence until he was about twenty-eight years in this world, and all that he has given us in song, essay, political report, artistic suggestiveness, and statesmanlike force, was made voluble and put into readable shape in the three years which filled the interim between that period and his death in September 16, 1845. His beautiful and brilliant "Life of Curran,' prefixed to the collection of "Speeches," was published in 1840, but it was upon a sudden, on the starting of the Nation newspaper, he felt his strength and fairly spread his wings.

Through bitter need of his genius, kindness and love, how deeply may not the Irish of our generation sympathize with the words of the generous and tender-hearted Englishwoman, Miss Mitford, who exclaims—"Oh! would that he (Davis) had lived to write volumes upon volumes of such lyrics as the 'Sack of Baltimore,' and 'Maire Bhan Astor,' such biographies as his 'Life of Curran,' and such criticism as his 'Essay upon Irish Song.'"

TWILIGHT THOUGHTS.

Enwrapt as with a spell my spirit seems,
Within the golden summer of my dreams.
Fair dreams! within your shadow, my fleet hours
Go linkéd, bound with a loose wreath of flowers.
I sit within the crimson-curtained room,
And lo, there swims before me in the gloom—
The waving shadow of the shaken trees,
The willow's tresses shaking in the breeze;
And through the forest paths brown Autumn goes,
Tossing the whirling leaves like showers of snows,
Down with the stormy greeting of his breath
In red and rustling eddies to the earth;
Shaking from her faint clasp the scattered flowers
Pale Summer culleth in her faded bowers—
Summer, so late the fair and haughty Queen
Of all the forest empire, wide and green—
And singing as he goes a rugged song
That rings the woodland's sounding glens along,
That starts within his den the dappled deer,
And sends him sweeping on his far career,
Swift rustling through the dry and crackling shade,
His antlers gleaming o'er the open glade,
And by the forest waters flying fast,
His shadow on the tide a moment cast;
Then there are purple sea-shells by the shore,
Whereon the rippling tide comes sounding o'er;
And on the light blue waters far away,
I watch the laughing Nereids in their play
Upon the ocean crests so white and fair,
Shaking the shining spray from their loose hair.
And far above, amid the fissured rock,
Some fair flowers tremble o'er the ocean's shock,
In their aerial beauty sweet and far
Like the pale unreached beauty of a star;
Then there are mosses round the gnarled roots
Of old trees laden with the golden fruits,
And ivy clothing with a green decay
The ruined walls of ages passed away.
Would I could mould and marshal as I ought
Into fair forms these conscript bands of thought.
Could I—oh! there were music in their march,
And sunlight on the vales their banners arch;
But like unwary ranks that fear no foe,
The loose battalions wander to and fro—
Some on the crested hill's sweet summer side,
Some cast along the river's gentle tide;
Some culling crimson berries in the woods,
Some flinging fragrant blossoms on the floods—
Or rather is their bright unquiet flight
Like fire-flies glancing through the leaves at night;
Or like the gorgeous tints the red sun hath,
Left bright behind him on his parting path,
Fading to sullen gray when he is gone.
So shine the bright thoughts, swiftly speeding on,
As fade the transient glories from our sight
Into the dusky shadow of the night—
So fade they in the blank array of words,
And all the music ebbeth from the chords. ENUL.

Sander's "Young Ladies' Reader," published by Ivison and Phinney, is a very useful volume. It embraces a comprehensive course of instruction in the Principles of Rhetorical Reading, and a more than usually well-selected collection of exercises in Prose and Poetry, from a long list of popular as well as elegant writers. It has been the desire of Mr. Sanders to illustrate by his book the observation of the Younger Pliny, who says, "As in life, so in studies, the most beautiful and the most humane thing is, I think, so to blend the grave and gay, that the one may not settle down into melancholy, nor the other degenerate into levity." The Collector—whom we will take at his word—states that his labor "cost a deal of time and a deal of thought." The rules for reading—given by the author—appear to be well considered.

SMITH O'BRIEN'S MEDITATIONS IN EXILE.

PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT; or, Meditations in Exile. By WILLIAM SMITH O'BRIEN. In two volumes. Dublin, James Duffy.

The same, one volume, with notes. Boston, P. Donahoe.

If the present work were not of intrinsic worth and value, it would commend itself to all good and thoughtful men on other grounds. It would be impossible to regard it without deep interest when we know that in its composition one of the purest and noblest characters of our time found mental solace during a large portion of the six years' imprisonment he underwent for the cause of his native land. Divested of almost all the ordinary interests of life during this period, Mr. O'Brien naturally endeavored to create some occupation which would employ the time hanging listlessly on his hands, and lighten his anxieties, if not actually cheer his mind.

To such a mind philosophy afforded the surest comfort; and knowing the leanings of Mr. O'Brien's mind, and his long experience in public affairs, it is not to be wondered at that his lucubrations took a Governmental and Political shape, guided by that impartiality so characteristic of the man. The eminent exile informs us in his preface that had he been able to command access to the requisite materials, it is probable he would have undertaken to write a History of Ireland; his anxious desire being to connect his labors with the fortunes of the country, to the service of which his life "ever has been and ever will be devoted." This loving intention was rendered futile, almost at the outset, from the fact that the exile was entirely cut off from the opportunities of research into matters pertaining to the nationality of Ireland. The same scantiness of literary resources prevented him from entering on a new course of study. He was, therefore, obliged to generalize his ideas, and as he says—"to write as a citizen of the world, rather than as an Irish patriot." Thus it was that the happy thought of turning to account the experiences of his former life occurred to him. As he was, by English law, virtually dead to the present, he lived upon the past; and from the lessons which it taught him, has deduced those principles which are now set before us. That the distinguished author not unadvisedly takes hold of his subject, the following extract sufficiently well indicates:

"During a period"—writes Mr. O'Brien—"of more than twenty-five years, I have had such opportunities of observation in regard of political affairs as present themselves to but few writers. I have been a member of the British Parliament during eighteen years. I have taken a part in the most perfectly organized, if not the most formidable, 'agitation,' that is known to recent history. As an Irish country-gentleman, I have been engaged during many years, in the details of local administration, whilst performing the duties of grand-juror, magistrate, guardian of the poor, and in discharge of other similar functions. I have been associated with many voluntary societies, both in England and Ireland, founded for the propagation of knowledge, and for the advancement of social progress. I have undergone imprisonment of various degrees during a period of six years; and as a transported convict, I have witnessed not only many different forms of penal discipline, but also of the earliest processes of colonization. Under these circumstances, it occurred to me that I could not employ my time more usefully than in endeavoring to frame a synoptical view of society, and to develope, in a summary manner, principles of organization, legislation and administration, which are generally applicable to all free states, whatever may be the peculiar tendencies of their population."

Mr. O'Brien intends his work to be a suggestive, not a dogmatical one, and confesses that the experience of the past has taught him to distrust his judgment. In discussing some of the questions presented, the arguments are so nicely balanced, that—says the writer—I have sometimes found great difficulty in my own mind in deducing from them a peremptory conclusion.

Of the variety of contingent questions treated in illustration of the great theme, we cannot do more at present than enumerate some of the leading and most interesting, such as—The origin of different kinds of government; Centralized and local administration; Legislative institutions; Representation of the people; Legislative privileges of an aristocracy; Fundamental principles of legislation; on Police—Treatment of prisoners, and the administration of justice; on Sanitary arrangements; Public Works—Relief of the poor; Public Works—Popular amusement; Religious and secular instruction and education; Finance; Foreign and Colonial affairs; and Trade, commerce and industry.

This, however brief epitome of the work, will suggest the deep importance and public interest of the questions discussed.

In issuing an American Edition, the publisher, "fully conscious of the responsibility of ushering a new book on the principles of public duty into a state of society so baffled and beset with theories as this," thought proper to employ an editor to annotate the text with such notes as "American experience or Catholic principles would seem to call for." This task the Editor avows he undertook with "unfeigned unwillingness." His duty, however, has been a slight one—the notes being useless and to our mind completely uncalled for. The Annotator protests against Mr. O'Brien's using the word "Usurpation" in speaking of Louis Napoleon's progress to power. However, as there was no choice left by the publisher between printing Mr. O'Brien's disquisition with Notes, or not at all, we must tolerate this intrusion on a work which the name alone of the celebrated author should have prevented.

"Learning about Common Things," by Jacob Abbott, is a pleasant parcel of familiar instruction for children, given in a clear conversational manner, on that great variety of subjects which attract the attention and awaken the curiosity of our younger days. Mr. Abbott is a good friend of little children, and scarcely less so is the artist who happily illustrates the book. Harper & Brothers.

THE POETRY OF FIGURES.

The following specimen of Revolutionary verse, describing chiefly the losses of the British at Saratoga, published in the newspapers of the era, has a far greater interest for us now than much better "poetry." Some one said of Tom Moore that he could versify Euclid, and satisfactorily work out an Algebraic exercise in graceful rhyme. The author of the following evidently could have kept a set of books in verse:

Here followeth the direful fate
Of Burgoyne and his army great,
Who so proudly did display
The terrors of despotic sway.
His power and pride and many threats
Have been brought low by fort'nate Gates
To bend to the United States.

British prisoners by convention	2,442
Foreigners—by contra-vention	2,198
Tories sent across the lake	1,100
Burgoyne and his suite in state	12
Sick and wounded, bruised and pounded Ne'er so much before confounded,	528
Prisoners of war before convention	400
Deserters come with kind intention	300
They lost in Bennington's great battle, Where Starke's glorious arms did rattle,	1,220
Killed in September and October	600
Ta'en by brave Brown, some drunk, some sober,	413
Slain by high fame Heckerman, - - On both flanks, on rear and van, - - Indians, settlers, butchers, drovers, - - Enough to crowd large plains all over, And those whom grim death did prevent From fighting against our continent; - And also those who stole away, - - Lest they down their arms should lay, - Abhoring that obnoxious day; - - The whole make fourteen thousand men, Who may not with us fight again. - -	300 14,000

This is a pretty just account
Of Burgoyne's legion's whole amount,
Who came across the Northern Lakes
To desolate our happy States.
Their brass cannons we have got all—
Fifty-six—both great and small;
And ten thousand stands of arms,
To prevent all future harms;
Stores and implements complete,
Of workmanship exceeding neat;
Cover'd wagons in great plenty,
And proper harness no way scanty.
Among our prisoners there are
Six generals of fame most rare;
Six members of their Parliament,
Reluctantly they seem content;
Three British Lords, and Lord Bellearras,
Who came, our country free to harass;
Two Baronets of high extraction,
Were sorely wounded in the action.

A Mr. W. J. Knowles has "printed for the author," a book entitled "Features of the Inauguration of the Franklin Statue in Boston." If the author is not completely successful, it must be admitted that his work is on the most approved model. An Exchange gives some extracts, from which we take a couple of Mr. Knowles poetical "features:"

"The form of Doctor Franklin, in front of City Hall,
The Boston people honor—the short as well as tall;
The country people like it—some put their glasses on,
Inspect his manly features, from morning until noon."

Mr. Knowles it will be seen deals in facts. There is—as people say—"more truth than poetry in him." As he does justice in the above stanza to the town and country folk who inspected the "manly features" of the doctor, the writer takes the subject of the statue itself into consideration in the following apostrophe:—

"Philosopher and citizen is stamped upon his brow,
A very serious thinker—to show what art can do;
'Tis Franklin kindly speaking to every thoughtful mind;
His native place was Boston—the history left behind."

Fifteen years ago, or thereabouts, Dmitrieff, a poet, was a Russian Minister for Home Affairs. He used to be greatly admired for his odes. An ode of his on the late coronation, has just appeared. The Russians—who are qualified to judge—speak of this lyrical effusion, from the pen of an author whom many had thought dead, as full of beauty and fire. A Moscow correspondent says that, in Nicholas' time, it would not have passed the censorship. One stanza says in purport—"Your throne is lofty, that you may be able to see suffering afar, among your subjects; it has steps, that your faithful people may approach you." This aged poet's ode has fairly beaten out of conversation all the usual verses of Court poets or courtier poets.

Ivan Dmitrieff was born in 1760, and consequently is now within a few years of being a centenarian. In "Talvi's" Languages and Literature of the Slavic Nations, he is credited with having exercised on the growing poetic literature of Russia a not less influence than that exerted by his contemporary, the historian, Karamzin, on the Russian prose. Dmitrieff had more taste and purity than any of his predecessors; and he was the first, says "Talvi," to prove by a great many poetical tales, fables, odes, etc., that imagination and correctness of language are not incompatible. He has a crowd of followers—amongst the most successful and best known of whom are Shukofsky, Koslof and Rosen, the translators of Byron.

Elihu Yale, the founder of Yale College, in New Haven, died in 1724, and was buried at the church in Wrexham, Wales. His monument, a plain altar tomb, bears this inscription—

Born in America, in Europe bred,
In Afric' travelled, and in Asia wed:
Where long he lived and thrived, in London dead.
Much good, some ill he did; so hope all's even,
And that his soul through mercy's gone to heaven.
You that survive and read this tale, take care
For this most certain exit to prepare.
Where blest in peace the actions of the just Smell sweet, and blossom in the silent dust.

Literary and Artistic News.

The late robbery of fifteen thousand pounds' worth of old pictures, has cast a ghastly paleness on the faces of all owners of galleries. The fact—says the London Athenæum—that an unscrupulous lover of art has been able coolly to visit the collection of Lord Suffolk, and then and there, as lawyers say, to rip out with a certain sharp edged tool, otherwise called a penknife, we dare not say how many Carraccis and Raphaels, has made the hair of all picture-collectors who do not wear a wig, stand bolt upright. Will no picture-restorer restore these jewels? Will no warder of Warpour-street point out this poacher of a nobleman's preserves? Rumor with its thousand quivering tongues, has it that heavy stocks of life-preservers, with whistles at one end and rattles and "knocker-dusters," are being laid in at the Ellesmere and other London collections. The Pantheon alone, proud in a justifiable humility, fears no thieves, and laughs at marauders. Joking apart, however, there can be no doubt that no property is so much exposed to risk, as valuable pictures. Take Italy—in the great palaces of Rome on a wet day, long suits of rooms are left open to the visitor while the mumbling curator bustles off to his little tiled room to watch the stew that is hissing for him over the charcoal brazier. A bold, daring man, accustomed to pictures, with a sharp heavy knife, could in ten minutes, easily rip out some forty thousand pounds worth of pictures, roll them round him, and hide them under the voluminous folds of a talma, or a boat-cloak. Suppose a carrozza ordered at the door at the given hour, our patron of art tumbles in, hurries to his hotel, picks up his acquirements, and having previously got his passport vised, pulls off his false beard and wig, changes his coat, packs up his cloak or sells it, and is off in an hour's time by diligence to Civita Vecchia, catches the boat, and in three days reaches Marseilles, and—disappears. In three years from this time, Paris is startled by an "Extraordinary discovery of rare pictures at a Chateau on the Loire." During the vacation, our adventurer, who is a careful art-student, and accustomed to imitate the manner of old masters, has disguised every picture and hidden all their peculiar marks; his spare moments of literary leisure having been devoted to compiling a history of them, and of their concealment during the Reign of Terror. He realises incredible millions of francs, and retires to America, where he makes himself celebrated as a patron of genius and hidden merit; eventually becomes magistrate of his district, and is peculiarly severe on petty-larceny. There can be no doubt, however, in all seriousness, that valuable pictures need watching; for burglars, like other men, have their fashions, and the garrotte, chloroform, ring-dropping tricks, &c., have each had their day, like fardingales, toupees, hoops, and shoe-buckles. There is no doubt that conveyancers—vulgo, thieves—have discovered a new California, and collectors must be on the alert in detection of so valuable a source of revenue.

There is second-hand bookseller in Hobart Town, whose history is worth mentioning. He is a very steady and respectable man, whose prosperity is the result of his fair dealing. He was a carriage liner by trade, and was imported by a respectable carriage-builder there under the bounty system of 1840. He worked for his employer for three years under an agreement, and then set up for himself as a repairer. He had purchased a small piece of land on which he had built a wooden cottage, but not in a principal street. In 1843, however, the colony was in a state of depression, and he found he could not make a living by his trade. One day he went to an auction sale of books to buy a book or two for his own reading. There he found books going for next to nothing, and it occurred to him that he could make a little money by purchasing some and selling them. A gentleman present, whom he consulted, advised him to try, and he accordingly invested £12 or £15 in books—I forget which sum, but certainly not more than the larger. He carried them home, and was in the act of displaying them on a board, when a passer-by purchased 28s worth at a large profit on the prices he had just paid. "This," said he, telling his own story, "made me a bookseller." The business prospered, and ten years after his stock consisted of 14,000 volumes, all made out of the original £15. He now occupies a large shop in a principal thoroughfare, and has a large trade—several gentlemen of Melbourne, who has private libraries, corresponding with him when they require books not to be found in the shops of our dealers in the "literature of the day."

Four volumes of Herzog's Encyclopedia of Protestant Theology have been completed. About a thousand articles are contained in these volumes, averaging somewhat more than two pages each; they are written by about one hundred contributors, including some of the first names in German Theology, as Bertheau, Delitzsch, Ebrard, Hahnn, Hoffmann, Kurtz, Muller, Tholuck, Schwarz, and others. Dr. Geffcken, in a recent work, to which he has devoted twenty-five years of study, on Catechisms before Luther's times, in the fifteenth century, enumerates 98 Latin printed Bibles before 1500; and 14 High German, and three or four Low German translations of the Scriptures; these last were used by Luther but with few alterations, in the Historical Books, and in the Epistles and Gospels for Sundays.

Mr. Robt. Chambers, the well-known publisher and author, is the proprietor of Glenmorriston, and, notwithstanding his enthusiasm in behalf of popular rights and privileges, manages his estate much after the usual fashion. He erected at the opening of an attractive walk a board on which was inscribed, "No thoroughfare this way. Trespassers will be prosecuted with the utmost rigor of the law." A wag during the night painted on the other side of the board, Chambers' Information for the People.

The New-Orleans Delta states that Mr. Oliphant, an English gentleman of high literary as well as social position, the author of a work which has had quite a run in England under the title of Shores of the Black Sea, is in this country, on his way to Nicaragua. Mr. Oliphant is supposed to be the writer of the articles on Circassia, now appearing in Blackwood, and his journey will probably result in a graphic sketch of the resources of Central America.

The Georgia Federal Union say that the Chair of the Natural Sciences, Chemistry, &c., of the South Carolina College, having been made vacant by the resignation of Prof. Brumby, the trustees have invited Dr. Joseph LeConte, of the Georgia University, to fill it. Dr. LeConte will accept the appointment.

The State Library at Albany now embraces 43,634 volumes, of which 30,011, including 144 volumes of manuscripts, are in the General Library and 13,623 in the Law Library. This is an increase of 20,360 volumes in five years.

Col. H. Yoakum, author of the History of Texas, died at Houston on the 26th ult., of consumption. He was not only a man of talent and genius, but of great public spirit, and abounding in private and Christian virtues.

The London Times says that M. Kossuth realized £3,000 sterling, $15,000, by his series of lectures in Scotland last season, and that he has received eighty invitations for winter lectures in Great Britain.

Alphonse Karr, the French author, has this singular, yet truthful, motto upon his signet ring: "I fear only those I love."

A FANTASY.

BY P. W. M.

'Tis told somewhere in Eastern story,
That those who love once bloomed as flowers
On the same stem, amid the glory
Of Eden's green and fragrant bowers,
And that though parted here by fate,
Yet when the glow of life has ended,
Each soul again shall find its mate,
And in one bloom again be blended.

If this be true, how sweet the vision
Which Fancy sometimes weaves for me,
That thou, amid those bowers elysian,
My lovely flower mate will be:
And Oh! how oft, when time and distance,
Perchance, may part thee from my side,
Will I pine for that existence
Where Fate can ne'er our live divide.

THE REFUGEES.

AN INDIAN TALE OF 1812.

BY EMERSON BENNETT,

Author of the "Prairie Flower," "Artist's Bride," "Clara Moreland," "Forest Rose," etc. etc.

CHAPTER I.

THE MESSENGER.

As the setting sun of the 20th of August, 1812, threw a broad sheet of burnished gold over the western heavens, from the horizon almost to the zenith, a horseman, in a green hunting frock, with a rifle resting on the pommel of his saddle, and tightly grasped with one hand, while the other held the reins of his panting and foam-covered beast, dashed swiftly through the great, dark, gloomy forest which then stretched over a vast tract of country in the northwestern portion of the State of Ohio. Guiding his gallant steed over the moist, level ground, through a dense growth of ash, elm, oak, beech, cotton-wood and poplar trees, whose thickly matted branches made twilight of noonday, and darkness of twilight, he soon reached the banks of a dark, deep river, known as the Maumee, or Miami of the Lakes. Here he reined his travel-worn beast to a halt, threw himself from his back, and ran up and down the bank for the space of three hundred yards, in eager search for the ford, which he did not find. Then he looked up and down the dark stream, over which the shadows of night were fast setting, and re-mounting his horse, rode him into the water, and swam him across to the opposite shore. On reaching the right bank of the river, he again urged his weary beast forward through a gloomy wood—where night had already spread her Plutonian pall, and a solemn, awful silence brooded, disturbed only by the dismal howl of the prowling wolf, or the hideous screech of the ominous owl—and in fifteen minutes more he gained an opening, and drew rein at the door of an humble log-hut, through whose crevices a faint light glimmered. Throwing the reins upon the neck of his drooping beast, and tightly grasping his rifle, he dismounted quickly, and tapped lightly on the slab door.

"Who's there?" demanded a voice from within, with the intonation peculiar to the natives of New England.

"Eden Stanforth," was the reply of the horseman.

Almost instantly the door was thrown open, and exclamations of pleasure broke from two of the four persons present.

These four persons consisted of a tall, large, strong, hard-featured, muscular man, of middle age—a small, pale, sharp-featured, thin-lipped woman of forty—a long, lank, awkward youth of twenty, with pocked face, flaxen hair, light blue eyes, and freckled skin—and a plump, fair, brown-haired, hazel-eyed, comely maiden of nineteen.

"Why, Eden Stanforth, be you back already? Who on earth thought of seeing you here to night?" said the elderly female who had opened the door, which she still held with one hand, while with the other she took the hand of the young horseman.

For young he was and handsome, possessing a fine, manly form, in the full flush and vigor of early manhood, with an open, frank, honest, intelligent countenance, an eye clear bright and expressive, and with waving locks rolling back from a broad, high, smooth forehead, and clustering around healthy-hued cheeks and temples.

"I hoped to surprise you, aunt?" he said quickly, as he pushed in and closed the door; "for had I failed in doing so, I fear you would soon have received a surprise of a more terrible nature."

"Mercy on us! what's happened?" cried the aunt in alarm, while the others held their breaths to listen to the reply.

"First," said Eden Stanforth," "do you know that war has been declared between our country and Great Britain?"

"No!" exclaimed the uncle of the young messenger, starting up from his seat: "Is such the fact?"

"Such is the fact," pursued Eden hurriedly; war was formally proclaimed by our government against Great Britain on the eighteenth of last June—though it is said that when the imbecile, treacherous, and cowardly old Hull marched through here, on the last of the same month, he did not know it."

"Eden, what do you mean, by speaking in such disrespectful terms of General Hull?" inquired the brother of the young man's father.

"Would that my words were daggers, to let out his heart's blood!" cried Eden, fiercely. "Oh! woe the day that such a man was appointed to command such a gallant band as he has basely betrayed and sacrificed!"

"Eden, speak! explain!" demanded the uncle, who was a man of a few words.

"He has surrendered Detroit, his army, and all the forts, garrisons, and military stores within his jurisdiction into the hands of the British, without so much as permitting a single blow to be struck in our defence!"

"You don't tell me so!" exclaimed the elder Stanforth, turning slightly pale, and involuntarily clenching his hand.

"Mercy on us!" cried Mrs. Stanforth, clasping her hands in alarm; "what'll this do to us, Eden?"

"Put us to flight, aunt, to save our lives!" cried the young man excitedly. "The horde of Indians, collected under the leadership of Tecumseh, having now no check at the North, will soon be upon these defenceless borders, to slaughter, pillage and burn, and lay waste the country—even now I fear they are on their way hither."

"This is indeed startling news!" said the uncle, musingly; "war declared and Hull surrendered! Eden, you havn't made any mistake?"

"No, uncle—no mistake—for even I was one of the parties surrendered."

"You, Eden—you?"

"Yes, uncle."

"Tell me all about it as quick as you can!" said the uncle.

"I must be very brief, then, uncle," replied Eden, "for I have not yet been home. "Here, Peleg," he continued, turning to the young man before mentioned, who, with blanched features, open-mouth, dilated eyes, and trembling limbs, stood listening to every word, and looking from one to the other, in terror: "here, run over to our house, and tell the news, and set them at making preparations to leave at once, say I will be with them in a few minutes."

"I—I—don't want to," said Peleg, shrinking back, and looking fearfully around him. "I'd rather not."

"Are you afraid to go?" said Eden.

"No, I ain't," replied Peleg; but I don't see no use in going when you're going right along yourself."

"You are afraid, Peleg! so do not deny it," exclaimed Mabel, catching up a sun-bonnet, and putting it upon her head. "I will go, Eden."

"No, no, Mabel," cried the young man, taking hold of her, "you shall not go. I will go myself in a few minutes, and Peleg White can remain, to boast some other day of what he would have done had he been placed in a situation of peril." And then he added in a lower tone, and one that brought a deeper blush to the cheeks of the brave girl: "Mabel, your life is too precious to be risked without absolute necessity. Hasten to prepare everything for our voyage, for aunt is so nervous that we cannot depend upon her forethought. I must explain this matter to uncle before I go home, for you know how slow he is to act till everything is understood."

Saying this, Eden turned from Mabel Duncan to his kinsman and resumed:

"I was about to tell you, uncle, of Hull's disgraceful surrender. On visiting Detroit, some ten day's ago, with Macy and Walbridge, with the intention, as you know, of locating some lands on a branch of the Huron River, we learned with surprise that hostilities had actually commenced between the United States and Great Britain; and that Hull had just returned from Canada with his army, where he had thrown away some good opportunities of conquest; and that it was expected, as he had not attacked and destroyed Malden, the British would shortly attack Detroit. You know, uncle, I have always had some strong military predilections, and the moment I heard there was likely to be a fight within a reasonable time, in which I could participate, I resolved to attach myself as a temporary volunteer to the company of Captain Wilson, with whom I had some slight acquaintance.

"Well, to be brief, the enemy soon appeared in force, erected batteries, demanded the surrender of the fort, and, being refused, began a bombardment which they continued all one night with little effect. The next day, through the sheer carelessness and neglect of Hull, they effected a landing, and were marching up to attack us—and we, in glorious anticipation of victory, were eagerly waiting the signal to begin the chastisement—when to our utter amazement, chagrin and indignation, we were ordered to stack our arms and prepare to surrender ourselves prisoners of war."

"What! without firing a gun?" cried the uncle, in astonishment.

"Yes, uncle, without one single, solitary discharge of our rifles and muskets!"

"The old scoundrel!" exclaimed the uncle.

"He deserves hanging!" cried the young man.

"Is he a traitor, or coward, Eden?"

"Both, I think! Oh! uncle, just fancy the feelings of the brave American soldiers at being thus basely deprived of their arms, by their own general, and surrendered prisoner's of war to a foe they could easily have conquered."

"The man's mad, or else we've got a successful Benedict Arnold among us," said the other. "How did you get away, Eden?"

"The British General gave the volunteers liberty to return home, but took old Hull and the regulars over to Canada. As soon as I got permission to leave, I made a search for my horse, which I found in the possession of an orderly sergeant, who returned him to me for a small compensation. I then bought back my rifle, mounted my beast and here I am, happily in time to give you all warning of danger."

"This isn't a safe place, just now, that's a fact," said the uncle, with a serious shake of the head.

"There is danger, uncle, go which way we may; but it struck me we should be safer on the river and lake, in our barge, than in journeying through the forest which I have reason to believe will soon be swarming with Indians, if indeed it is not at this moment. We will endeavor to meet some American settlement, further to the eastward, along the southern shore of the lake—but even if compelled to take refuge under a British flag, it will be far better than falling into the hands of the savages."

"And our horses, cattle, hogs and sheep—what of them"? queried the uncle seriously.

"We shall have to leave them to the tender mercies of the wild beasts and savages," answered Eden, with a sigh; if we can save our household goods and ourselves, it is all we can hope to do at present."

"You're right, Eden." pursued the uncle in a tone of decision, addressing his young kinsman; "you're right, and there's no help for it. It'll certainly be best for us to take to the barge and drop down into Lake Erie. Now hasten to get your father, mother, and sister ready for the voyage. Come, Esther—come, Peleg—come, Mabel—let's set to work at once."

"I will soon rejoin you," said Eden.

And hurrying out, he mounted his horse and rode quickly away.

CHAPTER II.

THE MIDNIGHT DEPARTURE.

A little before midnight of the same day our story opens, a party of eight persons, four of either sex, were slowly and silently moving across a small opening to the right bank of the Maumee, where a clumsily built barge of middling size was fastened to the shore. Seven of this party of eight were laden with different household articles, which they immediately deposited among numerous others of a similar character which had been previously brought to the boat from their dwelling; and being now all collected on board, and having with them all they intended taking from their deserted homes, they forthwith loosed the boat and pushed it out into the middle of the stream, where, for the time being, it was allowed to float quietly down on the bosom of the current.

This party, as the reader has doubtless conjectured, consisted of our young hero, Eden Stanforth, and his father, mother, sister, uncle, and aunt, and Mabel Duncan, and Peleg White.

Having floated a short distance down the stream, Eden took counsel with his uncle and father, and it was decided the boat should be brought to an anchor some little distance from the shore, and that one should remain on the watch till morning—when, should their be no signs of the enemy, a warning message could be sent to the inhabitants above, which, in their haste to effect their own safety, our voyagers had neglected to do at first.

"I take shame to myself," said Eden in a whisper, for it was not deemed prudent to speak in a loud tone, lest a lurking enemy might hear the sound, and so be attracted to their place of concealment: "I take shame to myself, that I did not ride to Major Spofford's and give him warning, so that he might convey the news to the next, and thus spread the evil tidings and put all on their guard."

"It ought to have been done, Eden," said his father, "and if it can be done without too great a risk, we mustn't neglect it in the morning."

"If you think best, father, I will attend to it to-night."

"No, my son, no; you have done enough to need rest. Two days on horseback, and only one night's fitful sleep on the bare ground! Go and lie down at once, and trust your uncle Amos to watch the boat."

Eden did not require much urging to induce him to seek rest for the night; and speaking a few quieting words to his mother, sister, aunt, and Mabel—all of whom were more or less nervous and excited—he threw himself down on a loose pile of bedding, and was soon last asleep."

Not so the others, who were not so fatigued as Eden, and upon whom the exciting news had produced an effect calculated to banish sleep for several hours. At the request of Daniel Stanforth, the father of Eden, who had been for years an invalid, and whose constitution was so broken and impaired as to render him unable to bear any great fatigue, they all repaired to their places of rest, where they conversed in whispers for a long time, conjecturing as to the future, and narrating occurrences of the past, till each was prepared to hear an Indian in every sound, or see one in every shadow, or in everything having motion.

But as the night wore slowly away, without presenting in a tangible shape the objects of their fears, they all at last yielded to the requirements of nature; and even Peleg White, the most frightened one of the party, fell into a doze and began to dream.

Suddenly he started up with a wild, terrific shriek; and dropping down on his knees and clasping his head with his hands, began to beg for his life in a most pitiful manner. His shriek aroused all parties, and was echoed by the females, who fully believed the Indians were upon them; and for a few minutes a scene of the wildest confusion prevailed.

"Fool!" cried Amos Stanforth, Peleg's guardian, who reached him first, and who, seizing him by the collar of his hunting shirt, jerked him to his feet, and shook him till all the teeth in his head rattled; "Fool! coward! what d'ye mean by making all this fuss for nothing?"

By this time Peleg had become fairly awakened; and as he feared his guardian in anger almost as much as he did the savages themselves, he slunk away without uttering a word in his defence.

But further sleep for any of the parties after this, was out of the question; and Eden Stanforth—who at the first sound of alarm, had started up and grasped his rifle, ready to sell his life dearly in defence of those he loved—now turned his whole attention to quieting the nervous excitement of the females, all of whom, except Mabel Duncan, were still trembling from their late fright and apprenensions for the future.

"Come, mother—come, aunt, and you, Carrie—I am astonished you should permit such a cowardly jackanapes as Peleg White to frighten you all out of your senses. Let me entreat you to lie down again, and get what rest you can, for really I do not think there is any danger. I do not think the Indians have reached this quarter yet, or we should have heard something of them."

"From what I've heard of them, they generally move about pretty quiet," replied the father.

"Until they make an attack," said Eden, "and then they give vent to their most terrific yells. If they were about to-night, in this vicinity, it is quite likely they would have attacked some of our neighbors before this, and we should have heard their death signal."

"I don't feel altogether at ease," said the father, drawing his son aside, and speaking in a low tone, which reached no ear but Eden's; I feel strangely oppressed with something like a presentiment of danger; but keep this to yourself, not a word of it to the women folks, or we shall have Bedlam over again. There is Peleg! That boy ought to be gagged, to keep him quiet; and if any harm comes to us to-night, I shall blame him for it."

"I never yet saw a boaster that was not at heart a coward," replied Eden; "and Peleg has often annoyed me by boasting what he would do in case he should ever be so fortunate as to be placed in a position of danger."

"This is very gloomy work," said the father, "sitting here in this old boat on the river, on a dark night, watching for unknown foes; I wonder how long it is to daybreak?"

"The dawn cannot be far off," replied Eden. "Look yonder, over the tree-tops, to the eastward! I think I see the first streak of day now."

"The sky looks reddish in that direction, but I'm not sure it's morning," said the other. "What do you think, Amos?" he continued, addressing his brother, who was standing within a few feet of him, apparently trying to peer into the darkness, which the thick shadows of the heavy trees on the nearest bank rendered almost impenetrable to the eye.

"It's not the dawn, David, if I'm a judge," was the answer, in a low, cautious tone.

"What do you think it is, uncle?" asked Eden.

"Fire!" was the laconic reply.

"Ha!" said Eden, with a start; "then the Indians must certainly be about—perhaps have already begun their horrible work! Had we not better take up our anchor and drop further down the stream?"

"Hush! listen!" returned the uncle, in a whisper; your ears are younger than mine, and ought to be better—do you hear anything?"

All listened, each holding his breath to catch the slightest sound. Each, too, turned his eyes upon the nearest shore, and strove in vain to distinguish a single object in the awful blackness, which, in that direction, seemed to rise like a wall before them. It was a starlight night, but slightly hazy; and looking directly upward, a line of the heavens could be seen; and this line, and this only, could be traced to some distance either way, showing the course of the dark river, which made the opening in the grand old gloomy forest, whose giant trees and thick undergrowth lined it banks on either side. From the position of the boat, being fairly in the dim light of the opening, it was possible for it to be seen by any one on the nearest bank who had become accustomed to the deeper darkness of the wooded shore; but for the same reason, it was impossible for any one on the boat, looking in that direction, to see ten feet into the gloomy shadows of the mighty forest.

"I hear only the slight rippling of the water, said Eden at length, in the same cautious whisper.

"I though I once or twice heard the snapping of a stick on the bank," rejoined his uncle, "though it might have been only fancy."

"Would it not be well to lift our anchor and drop further down the stream?" again suggested the young man, with not a little anxiety, as he thought of the precious lives aboard the boat, which might possibly fall a sacrifice to an unseen enemy, even then silently preparing to begin the work of death.

"I'm of that opinion," answered the uncle. "Come, let us lift it at once.

Eden and his uncle repaired to the windlass and were just in the act of giving it a turn, when a loud shriek from one of the females, followed by some half a dozen others in quick succession, caused them to desist, and grasp their rifles in fearful apprehension; but ere they had time to spring forward to ascertain the cause of the second alarm, three of the terrified parties were at their sides, clinging to them with trembling eagerness.

"Speak, Esther; what is it?" said Amos Stanforth to his half-fainting wife.

"Oh!" replied her sister-in-law, "we all saw the head of an Indian come peeping over the side of the boat!"

The above is all of this beautiful and highly interesting story that will be published in our columns. We give this as a sample. The continuation of it can be found only in the New-York Ledger, the great family weekly weekly paper, for which the most popular writers in the country contribute and which can be found at all the stores throughout the city and country, where papers are sold. Remember to ask for the New-York Ledger of Jan. 3, and in it you will get the continuation of the story from where it leaves off here. If you cannot get a copy at any news office, the publisher of the Ledger will mail you a copy on the receipt of five cents. Fanny Fern writes only for the New-York Ledger; Sylvanus Cobb, Jr., writes only for it; Emerson Bennett writes only for it; and nearly all the eminent writers in the country, such as Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Emma D. E. N Southworth, and Alice Cary, contribute regularly to its columns. It is mailed to subscribers at $2 a year, or two copies for $3. It is the handsomest and best family paper in the country, and is characterized by a high moral tone.

MILITARY CORRESPONDENCE.

WASHINGTON, December 10, 1856.

MR. EDITOR—

Having had the honor of an invitation from the "Georgetown College Cadets" to participate with them in a late parade, I deem it but right to furnish you with an account of their proceedings. On the 4th inst., this company, composed exclusively of the students of Georgetown College, preceded by Wither's Excelsior Brass Band, left the old college halls, and marching through the principal thoroughfares of Georgetown and Washington, proceeded to the White House, where they were ushered into the famous and gorgeous East-Room, and also into the presence of the Chief Magistrate, his Cabinet, and a select number of ladies and gentlemen. The Commander of the Corps, Chas. B. Kenny, Esq., of Pennsylvania, then addressed his Excellency, as follows:

"Mr. President: On the part of the "Georgetown College Cadets, and the noble institution which they represent here, in this chamber, the scene of so many exhibitions of American feeling and patriotism, hallowed too by the constant presence of America's noblest pride, I tender you the assurance of our utmost regard and esteem. My own emotions, at this moment, standing in the presence of him whom from our mother's knee we are taught to regard with reverence and awe, would indeed silence my tongue, had I not an honorable, a high and sacred duty to perform. When an institution which some of the most brilliant scholars in our country, the most profound philosophers and sagest statesmen are proud to call their "Alma Mater," has selected so unworthy a representative of her sentiments, he is at once entitled to your kind attention, he speaks what even the noblest ruler of men might be proud to hear and to deserve—the commendations of the good.

"You see here, before you, hearts young and ardent, glowing with the purest love of their country; congregated, too, from the very extremities of this mighty, indissoluble Union, a communion of States in the communion of their children, from the frowning forests of Maine to the glowing soil of California, the "Spes magnæ altera Romæ," all in one mind and with one voice testifying their affection to yourself, and their admiration of the manner in which you have discharged the awful duties of your office. We are not soldiers by profession; but we find in the exercises of the soldier an agreeable and profitable amusement, and to this we are the more incited when we reflect that the brightest and noblest names that adorn the pages of our country's history, have been alike distinguished in the cabinet and in the field. But in the names of all those you see around you, and in the name of that venerable institution which we love, while we express our high appreciation of your conduct as a statesman, we cannot omit the earnest mention of our thanks, deep and sincere, for the particular interest you have manifested in the "Alma Mater" of our choice. Alluding gracefully to the eminent public services of the President in piloting the Ship of State successfully through the furious political tempests which lately beset her, he concluded as follows—"In the name of our Company, then, I thank you for the truly American and constitutional manner in which you have administered justice to all; I thank you in the name of the Faculty of Georgetown College, who know how to appreciate worth, and pay a willing tribute to virtue; I thank you in the name of all the young and glowing hearts you see around you, in which the memory of this day will be fresh as now, when you, perhaps, will have been called to a higher and purer reward for your generous and patriotic labors; I thank you in the name of my native noble Keystone State, the bulwark of a nation's safety and hopes, that has stamped the seal of her approbation upon your public acts with more than 230,000 of her freemen's votes; I thank you in the name of every true-hearted American citizen, who cherishes the union and prosperity of our common country. And when you will have retired from the glories and cares of so mighty a government—when amid the beauty and grandeur of Nature, which make your own dear Granite State the Switzerland of America, your untrammeled spirit will find new and surer springs of pleasure and delight—oh! remember still the depth and sincerity of our regard—remember that you have a monument more enduring than brass—more lasting than marble, in the undying, eternal gratitude of your countrymen!"

Upon the conclusion of Mr. Kenny's remarks, the President replied happily and appropriately, to the effect that though the Cadets represented different sections of the country, they were still united in feeling; that no geographical lines could divide the interests and hearts of Americans—no blow could be struck at one section of the country witout injuring the section whence it originated. He complimented the Company highly on their appearance, and referred to the benefits of citizen soldiery; of the prodigies of valor performed by volunteers fighting on the fields of Mexico, all of which resulted from the habitual use of arms. In concluding, the President spoke in terms of high regard of the institution represented by the Cadets, and of its honorable President.

On leaving the White House, the Cadets proceeded to the Washington Seminary, where they partook of a collation, prepared by that "Taylor of Washington"—Charles P. Gautier, Esq. After full justice had been done to the good things, the following toasts and sentiments were offered:

By Capt. Charles Kenny, of Pa,—"My native Pennsylvania—as the arch can never be broken while the keystone remains firm, neither can our glorious federal arch be dissolved until the noble old Keystone State be severed in twain—until the back of the Alleghanies be broken."

By Lieut. Frank Ward, of Baltimore—"The Rev. President of Georgetown College—may such associations ever be honored with his presence, and may his hopes in respect to the Cadets be ever realized, as I trust they have been to-day."

By Lieut. F. Lancaster, of Pa.—"Liberty, Union and the Constitution!"

By Ensign Frank Neale, of Md.—Charles P. Gautier—may fortune attend him, as he supplied this plentiful banquet, where at weeping was banished but not gnashing of teeth."

By William Choice, of S. S.—

"Here's the grand fabric—our free Constitution,
As built on the base of our great Revolution;
And longer with Politics not to crammed,
Be Anarchy cursed, and Tyranny damned;
And who would to Liberty e'er prove disloyal,
May his son be a hangman, and he the first trial!"

By Cornelius O'Flynn, of Mich.—"The Ladies of the District, God bless their darling little souls—may their smiles e'er continue to encourage the 'bould sojers' of Georgetown College, and may the gallant Cadets yet find among their chosen midst their future companions through life."

By Emile Rost, of Louisiana—"Frank Pierce—the President of these United States."

By Nicholas Hill, of Md.—"James Buchanan—his deeds speak his fame."

By Cornelius O'Sullivan of N. Y.—"The patriot martyrs of Ireland—'98 and '48."

Numberless other sentiments were proposed, and among the many eloquent speeches delivered, a real gem was produced by the Rev. Mr. Maguire, S. J., President of the College—who seemed to outdo even himself in this happy effort. At a late hour the Cadets set out for home to the inspiring strains of the "Geo. Town Col. Cadet Quick Step," and were everywhere greeted by the smiles of the fair sex, who expressed their admiration of the gallant students in showering bouquets and garlands upon them. They well deserved all the honors, as their military bearing and excellent drilling drew down the encomiums of the oldest Military men in the District of Columbia. They numbered 80 rank and file, and beneath their simple but neat uniforms beat hearts responsive to every dictate of Liberty—to every appeal of charity. May they long live to remember the 4th of December, 1856. is the wish of—

Your obedient servant,

SAVAGE'S '98 AND '48.

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

12mo., cloth, $1.

There is no one work which gives the spirit of the memorable periods to illustrate which the author has devoted the present volume. It contains vivid and carefully collated descriptions of the principal battles of the United Irishmen of '98, and a clear statement of the circumstances which led to the differences between "Old Ireland" and "Young Ireland," the line of national policy adopted by the latter, with biographical notices, &c. &c.

The third edition has been very usefully improved. Forty pages have been added, embracing an Appendix and a copious Index, containing nearly twelve hundred references to political facts, military movements, and personal allusions to the text. The Appendix is peculiarly valuable to the historical student, in giving the original addresses issued by the national bodies in Ireland during the revolutionary months of '48, including those issued by the Irish Confederation, the Protestant Repeal Association, the Trades and Citizens of Dublin, the Students, etc., to the French Republic, to the People of Ireland, to the Protestants of Ulster, to the Political Clubs on Trial by Jury, and against Lord Clarendon. They form a chapter of the European History of that eventful year to which every future writer on the subject must refer; and as they can be found in no other publication, their presence here must greatly enhance the historical value of this work.

OPINIONS OF THE CRITICS.

Here is a volume worth reading.—Troy Budget.

A decided book.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

One of the most valuable contributions to the literature of the day that has fallen under our notice.—Orleans Republican.

We owe to Mr. Savage—himself an exile, and one into whose soul the iron of British tyranny has deeply entered—our sincere acknowledgments for the errors of which he has disabused our judgment; our sincerest thanks for the sad and yet resplendent pageant which he has caused to pass before our eyes. We welcome his history of the modern politics and literature of Ireland as the fulfilment of a long-felt need; it enables us to understand a thousand things which seemed before incomprehensible enigmas; it bears the authoritative stamp of one who has been behind the scenes, and himself a participant in the drama; it is candid and analytical in its criticsm, alike of friends and foes; and to sum up all its merits in the most important, it seems to be fearlessly and vehemently true.—U. S. Democratic Review.

One half of this book is valuable; the other moiety is invaluable, and treats of the political agitation during the reign of O'Connell, and more particularly of the public men who asserted the nationality of Ireland from 1843 to 1848. * * * He has written with intimate knowledge of his subject, with earnest enthusiasm, and with graphic force. As might be expected, the best portion is that devoted to the more recent events in Irish history, when Davis, and Mitchel, and Meagher, endeavored to raise Ireland from a province to a nation. The comparison between Tone and Grattan is a brilliant chapter, glittering with antithesis; the narrative of the campaigns of 1798 is full of interest; the account of the United Irishmen condenses volumes of biography into a single chapter; the sketch of Lord Plunket will strike on account of its honest and scornful indignation, but the engrossing interest of the volume properly commences with the comparison, elaborate but never tedious, between O'Connell and Mitchel. In this chapter, and in another relating to the late Thomas Devin Reilly, will be found the most complete, vivid and truthful account yet published of the latter days of O'Connell's reign, and of the whole struggle in act and thought, by word and deed, of the "Young Ireland" patriots of our own time.—N. Y. Daily Times.

The author is a man of ardent poetic temperament, of strong national feeling, and of enthusiastic attachment to the cause in which he bore a prominent part at an early age. * * * His narrative is always lively and frequently graphic, and presents an interesting view of the past career of several of our well-known adopted countrymen.—N. Y. Tribune.

Mr. Savage could not have chosen a theme more attractive or better suited to his brilliant pen. * * To the composition of his volume he has brought an enthusiasm, ever quickened by an intense love of his native land, and a sleepless, avenging memory of her sufferings, combined with a peculiar genius for his work and a critically tempered judgement, that has forbidden him to sacrifice aught of truth and soberness to impulses inspired by personal sympathies.—N. Y. Evening Mirror.

The book is not only of deep interest but truly national and ably written. * * The host of great and popular names given, and the events with which they are entertwined, afforded our ingenious friend broad and rare scope for observation and research, of which he has most industriously taken advantage.—Irish American.

Mr. Savage seeks to give us principles as well as facts. He philosophises while he narrates. His book is suggestive as well as instructing; it awakens thought as well as emotion.—Christian Herald, Cincinnatti.

Will be endorsed by the real friends of the Irish.—City Item.

A thoroughly Irish book, written in the interest of the Young Ireland party, who would, if they could, have renewed in 1848, the bloody struggle which resulted so disastrously for the United Irishmen in 1798.—Daily British Whig, Kingston, Canada.

Mr. Savage is a man of considerable talent. * * * Well read in the history of his country, he was also intimately acquainted with all the leaders of the popular cause in the last movement, and his work is consequently full of information and interest.—Boston Traveller.

Mr. Savage wields an able pen, and his acquirements and opportunities render him well fitted to do justice to the theme. * * * He has acquited himself nobly.—Daily Mail, Boston.

Mr. Savage writes in a bold and vigorous style, giving evidence of high intellectual ability, and, though inclined to view the past events which he describes with a partial eye, he is entitled to much credit for the interesting subject matter of his history and the elegant dress of diction in which he has clothed it.—Evening Pilot, Montreal.

Tells some home truths of the demagogues who have sported and traded upon the wrongs of his country.—Savannah Republican.

We can safely commend this book.—Vicksburg Whig.

The style in which the work before us is written, is admirable.—Boston Trumpet.

The volume concludes with a fine sketch of Devin Reilly.—Hartford Evening Press.

The characters of O'Connell, Mitchel, O'Brien, Doheny and Meagher are ably presented and analyzed.—Boston Daily Times.

The fair land of Erin could not be in better hands than those of John Savage, and in the volume before us, we think his pen has dealt justly by such men as Wolfe Tone, Henry Grattan, Mitchel, O'Brien, Reilly and others.—Boston Intelligencer.

Written with a spirit of enthusiasm and a power of delineation worthy of the pen of John Savage. * * * In a word, he gives us a most graphic picture of all that both Protestants and Catholics can obtain of Ireland during the last half century.—Spectator, Albany.

It is impossible, in a mere paragraph, en passant, to give any correct notion of the variety of material, in History, Biography, Literature, and Society, which is contained in this single volume. Mr. Savage is a bold, free, unaffected writer—earnest, eager, impetuous.—Charleston Courier.

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a Subscriber to Mr. O'Mahony's translation of "Foras Feasa ar Erinn."

That is a book long wanted, and which the Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Elliott had lived, it would have been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America, a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes as Mr. O'Mahony. I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

Faithfully yours, JOHN MITCHEL.

TAILORING—1856-7.

George P. Fox has removed to his recently purchased store, house and lot, No. 47 Amity street, near Broadway, thereby freeing himself from the exactions and unenviable trammels of a Broadway landlord, at a saving in favor of his customers at the rate of $5000 to $6000 per annum. The general arrangements, particularly the cutting and sewing departments, are admitted by those who have already patronized his new establishment, to be decidedly superior to any of his former stores, Nos. 321, 333, 531 Broadway.

WALLACK'S THEATRE.

THIS Theatre was opened for the season on Wednesday September 17. Its object will be, as it has been, to sustain the Drama in artistic purity and intellectual respect. The company, through whose energies and abilities this object has been so successfully attained, will remain substantially the same as in past seasons.

It is the intention of the management to produce dramas in the same style as those put forth by Charles Kean at the Princesses Theatre, London.

LOVE IN A MAZE.

Electro-Magnetic Baths.—The Electro-Magnetic Baths having become permanently established as a remedial agent for the cure of Inflammatory and Chronic Rheumatism, Gout, Stiff and Enlarged Joints, Paralysis, Ulcers, Tic Toloreux, Neuralgia, Pain in the Limbs, &c. &c., and for the positive extraction of Mercury and other Mineral Poisons from the human system, the Messrs. Sloan & Co. take this method of informing the public that they have fitted up and opened an establishment at No. 53 Sixth Avenue, where the Baths will be constantly in operation, under the care and direction of Dr. G. H. Doyle, Homeopathic Professor of Medicine. To those unacquainted with "Electro-Magnetism" as applied to the cure of disease, reduction and extraction of mineral poisons, &c., we would say that as a means of cure for the above enumerated diseases, it has received the almost universal endorsement of the various Academies of Medicine throughout Europe and the United States, and that the reduction of Metals by a Voltaic Current, is no new science: it is the APPLICATION of the FACT to its extraction from the system for which we claim originality. In it we dismiss all theories—we leave nothing to chance—we are not led by blind experience, but we follow unerring and never failing principles.

Thousands who are now suffering from what they imagine to be Rheumatic Pains in the Joints, Bones, &c., are in fact suffering from the injurious exhibition of mineral poisons taken probably many years previously. To such we are positive in our promise of a permanent and speedy cure. Females laboring under complaints incidental to their sex, will find in this remedy a means of relief at once pleasant and satisfactory. A competent lady in constant attendance for their special accommodation.

Persons afflicted in any way with sickness, debility, &c. will do well to call at the office, examine the Baths, and receive full explanation of the treatment pursued. SLOAN & CO., 53 Sixth Avenue,

Daguerreotypes.

Mark the Facts!—J. GURNEY'S establishment, No. 349 Broadway, corner of Leonard street, is the oldest and most extensive in the United States. GURNEY was the first to introduce the Art of Photography in this city. GURNEY has recently made important alterations and improvements in his establishment. GURNEY has now greater facilities for producing finer work in every branch than has heretofore been produced in this country. GURNEY has still in his employ the best of his old artists. GURNEY has recently added to the above a talented corps of American, French, and German artists. GURNEY'S colored Photographs of all sizes need only to be seen to be appreciated; they speak for themselves. GURNEY'S plain, unretouched Photographs were never equaled—so say artists and the best judges. GURNEY'S Daguerreotypes are universally pronounced superior productions. GURNEY has received more testimonials for his skill than any other artist in the profession. GURNEY received the only medal for Photographic productions at the late Paris Exposition—consequently, GURNEY stands at the head of the world in the Photographic Art. GURNEY has not removed any branch of his business to any part of the city. GURNEY has no connection with any other establishment in any part of the city. GURNEY attends personally to his patrons and friends, and has done so for the last sixteen years. GURNEY will be most happy to continue that attention, and will still endeavor to please all who may favor him with a visit to his Photographic Palace of Art.

FACTS
THAT NEED NO MARKING.
Progression.

From Humphrey's Photographic Journal of Sept. 1856.

We do not approve of the plan of puffiing the members of the Photographic profession by way of personals. This may do very well when one is trying to bring his works into favor with such as are susceptible to flattery, and measure out their support according to the amount of editorial ink used as bait. We feel confident that those who best know will agree with us as that it is no puffing, when we can say with so much truth, that the Photographic Art this day owes, in no small degree, its position in this country to Mr. C. D. FREDRICKS, a gentleman who was the first to introduce the Photographic process upon an extensive scale in America. Previous to his establishing himself here, he visited Europe, and, with an enterprise worthy of imitation, he was not satisfied with first securing what knowledge he could himself gain, but also engaged the services of sevcral of the most eminent Parisian Artists. He then, in connection with Mr. GURNEY, opened an establishment on a plan unequaled in the world.

After succeesfully following his profession, in connection with Mr. G., for some time, he has opened a "Temple of Art" in this City, under his own professorship and supervision. We have honestly and candidly presented the foregoing, feeling that is justly due to a fellow-laborer.

CHARLES D. FREDRICKS, late GURNEY & FREDRICKS, Photographs, Daguerreotypes, Ambrotypes, &c., No. 585 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel.

FACTS WHICH ARE KNOWN.—PHOTOGRAPHS DAGUERREOTYPES, AMBROTYPES, &c.—The undersigned having removed the Photograph department and his Parisian artists from his old place of businees, No. 349 Broadway, to his new and magnificent establishment, No. 585 Broadway, would call the attention of public to the fact that his Galleries, and the pictures made in them, are supe rior to anything before exhiited. Those desiring Photograps, Daguerreotypes, or Ambrotypes, executed by artists of refined taste, wouid do well to call and judge for themselves. Reception Rooms on the first floor, and are open from 8 A. M., to 10 P. M.

OLD DR. BONE'S

JUSTLY CELEBRATED Vegetable Family Medicines.
NO CURE, NO PAY.

MEDICAL DEPOT—559 Sixth Avenue, near 34th Street;

Being the best medicine for strengthening the Stomach, creating an appetite, cleansing the blood of impurities, and regulating the whole system. They are the best medicines now in use for Pulmonary Complaints, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Rheumatism, both Chronic and Inflammatory, Fits, General Debility, Fever and Ague, Scrofulas, Ulcers, and all other humors of the blood. Price $1.

PILLS,

So long celebrated for cleansing the blood, discharging the bile, and removing obstructions in all cases where such medicines are needed. They have had no equal for the last fifty-five years. Price Twenty-five Cents.

These medicines are all prepared by LEWIS H. BONE, the only son now living of old Dr. Bone, who, by request of many of his father's patrons, has opened a Medical Depot in this city.

CAUTION.—Beware of Counterfeits, as unprincipled persons are trying to palm off their worthless trash on the public, without any regard to the evil effects it may have on the constitutions of those they deceive. The public will please take especial notice that every label is signed with the written signature of LEWIS H. BONE, only son of the late Dr. Christian Bone, without which none are genuine. References to thousands of the most respectable men in New-York and New-Jersey.

☞ All my authorised agents have a printed certificate signed by L. H. Bone.

For sale at No. 9 Bible House; First Avenue, corner of Houston street; Bowery, corner of Fourth street; corner of Broadway and 22d street; 91 and 695 Eighth avenue, near 48th street; corner of Canal and Hudson streets; E. TO THE PUBLIC!

Consumption---Watkinson's Pulmonacia.

A SAFE, reliable family medicine, warranted not to contain a particle of mercury or any other mineral poison; not a nine day's wonder got up to sell and humbug the public. He has used it for years in private families of friends, and now, at the urgent request of hundreds who have seen its remarkable cures, where every other remedy has failed, he offers it to the public to benefit and relieve those suffering with that fatal disease, so inherent to our changeable climate, carrying off its thousands to an early grave—Consumption. It has effected some of the most remarkable cures ever heard of; how some dear friend was saved from death, when all hope was given up, now lives and enjoys good health. Its rare qualities are not only in relieving consumptive patients, but for all diseases of the lungs, racking nervous cough, night sweats, bronchial affections of the throat, internal inflammation, where the blood is impure, it has no equal. The discoverer of PULMONACIA is RICHARD WATKINSON, a gentleman of well-known standing in Philadelphia and New-York. Those that are acquainted with him know there is no quackery or humbug about it, as the number of certificates that can be obtained at the office will satisfy the most incredulous as to its value.

LITTELL, SON & CO., BOSTON.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

THIS work is made up of the elaborate and stately essays of the EDINBURGH, QUARTERLY, and other Reviews; and BLACKWOOD' noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen Political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History and Commen Life, by the sagacious SPECTATOR, the sparkling EXAMINER, the judicious, ATHENEUM, the busy and industrious LITERARY GAZETTE, the sensible and comprehensive BRITANNIA, the sober and respeotable CHRISTIAN OBSERVER; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the UNITED SERVICE, and with the best articles of the DUBLIN UNIVERSITY, NEW MONTHLY, FRASER'S, TAIT'S, AINSWORTH'S, HOOD'S and SPORTING MAGAZINES, and of Chambers' admirable JOURNAL. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from PUNCH; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of THE TIMES. We shall increase our variety by importations from the Continent of Europe, and from the growth of the British Colonies.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday—price, (free of postage) six dollars a year. Remittances for any period will be promptly attended to.

Complete sets of the FIRST SERIES, in thirty-six volumes, handsomely bouud, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principle cities, free of expense of freight, are for sale for Seventy-two Dollars. The Second Series began in 1853.

Any volume may be had separately, at Two Dollars, bound, or a Dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents—and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

☞ A few advertisements of Books, Patents, or other matters of general interest, will be added, at reasonable rates.

Extracts of Letters from Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, and President Adams.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I have read the prospectus with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give healthy tone, not only to our literature but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character.

JOSEPH STORY.

NEW-YORK, May 7, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of the "Living Age;" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates (of which I have no reason to doubt), it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day.

JAMES KENT.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe, and in this country, this has appeared to me the most useful. It contains, indeed, the exposition only of the current literature of the English language; but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind, in the utmost expansion of the present age.

J. Q. ADAMS.

THE PANORAMA OF LIFE AND LITERATURE.

Published Monthly at the Office of Littell's Living Age,

Boston.

Every number of this work contains articles of leading interest; grave and earnest, yet not heavy; popular, and yet of abiding value. To these are added, in profuse abundance and great variety, Tales, Poetry, Voyages, Travels, and whatever—within the bounds of sound taste and good principles—may be included under the large head of Light Reading. But mere light reading soon becomes wearisome, unless there breathe from it spirit and heart, life and soul.

We promise a Magazine that shall be more and better than mere amusement: a Book suited to the leisure of the old and wise, and yet abundantly attractive to the young and ardent. It will freely provide for the Imagination, as well as for the Reaaon and Memory.

For THREE DOLLARS A YEAR, received at the office of publication, the Panorama will be sent (free of postage), to any post-office in the United States.

Two COPIES, Five Dollars a year; FIVE COPIES, Ten Dollars a year, Clubs to pay their own postage, which is three cents a number, payable QUARTERLY IN ADVANCE.

The first number was issned in July, 1855. It makes two large volumes a year. We can snpply orders for back numbers or volumes.

Both Works are Published by Littell, Son & Company, Boston.

Charles' London Cordial Gin, the first established and the only Imported.

This celebrated Gin, introduced into the United States by E. C. Charles, in 1851, has become so extensively counterfeited and imitated by one or two liquor mixers in New-York and Boston that it becomes our duty to advise with you on the nature of the poisons disseminated amongst you by these unscrupulous parties.

The records of the Custom House in the cities of New-York, Boston, and Philadelphia, show that Charles' London Cordial Gin is the only London Gin really Imported into the United States, and sold in bottles; and the fact has been demonstrated and published in all the New-York papers, that the only importation of London Cordial Gin ever made except by ourselves, has been one Pipe, imported in 1855. On the credit of this solitary Pipe, which would not fill six hundred bottles, over one hundred thousand dozen, of a noxious mixture, called "London Cordial Gin," prefixed with different names, have been spread all over this Continent, and sold at a cost twenty per cent. below the cost of importation of London Cordial Gin.

If corroboration were necessary, Mr. Udolpho Wolfe of New-York, who keeps record of every import of Gin, has over his own signature published to the world this statement, and it remains (even by the parties who have adopted our title) an unanswered, confirmed fact beyond the power of disproof, that Charles' London Cordial Gin, is the only genuine article, and hence that all others are nothing more or less than Ohio spirits in their raw state impregnated with poisonous materials, to give flavor to the mixture.

The Genuine Charles' London Gin is distilled especially for the undersigned in London, under the surveilance of the British excise laws, and is imported solely by us. It bears the endorsement of over five thousand physicians, in Great Britain and the United States. It has stood the most severe tests of the most skillful chemists and essayists. It is the only Gin which has the approval of the most celebrated practitioner America has ever produced—Dr. Valentine Mott, of New-York, who in a letter to Mr. Charles, says, "It is the finest, the most reliable, and most vigorous extract of Juniper he had ever seen."

The genuine Charles' London Cordial Gin is for sale in quart and pint bottles, by all Druggists and Grocers. Be sure that, though styled "London Cordial Gin," it is absolutely Charles'. To escape adulterated and poisonous mixtures, it does not suffice that the article be labelled London Cordial Gin, but be certain it is Charles'. Every other is injurious to health.

ELIZABETHAN ALE.

MEDICAL men now very generally recommend the occasional use of pure ale to those who are in need of nourishment; and it is undoubtedly the most wholesome beverage for general use that can be found. This is uot a new idea. In Queen Elizabeth's time our ancestors universally consumed it—from Elizabeth herself, in her palace, to the farmer in the field. In those days, adulterated wines and fiery liquors may be said to have been unknown, and very heavy penalties were enacted against using anything except malt and hops in brewing. It is not at all extravagant to assert, that the average duration of the life of a large portion of our race is a third less than it was two or three huudred years ago, and this is chiefly attributable to what we eat and what we drink. Even now the heartiest people that can be found are from the rural districts of England, who yet follow the old fashioned diet.

All who use ale, whether as a beverage or for the purpose of nourishment, will find the Elizabethan Ale most excellent. Being made on the Scotch plan, it is as pure and wholesome, (if not equal in flavor) as the imported, while its cost is but little more than a common article. TWO LARGE EDITIONS IN THREE MONTHS!!!

JUST PUBLISHED, PRICE $1 50. The Second Edition, revised and corrected,

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.

Pages of its History—By Henry de Courcy, Author of "Le Servantes de Canada."

Translated and concluded by John Gilmary Shea.

Possessing great industry and rare talent for historical narration, combined with true Catholic feeling and a sincere love of Truth, Mr. De Courcy has grouped together the most important facts in the history of the Church in Maryland, Virginia, and the Middle States, with a general view of the progress of Catholicity in the country.

Among the important matters embraced in the volume are,

I. Sketches of Archbishops Carroll, Neale, Marechal, Whitfield, Eccleston, Kenrick, and Hughes. Bishops Conwell, Concanen, Connolly, Dubois, Barron, Kelly, Whelan, McGill, O'Connor, Neumann, Young, Bayley, McCloskey, Timon, Loughlin, Prince Gallitzin, Father Malou. Rev. Messrs. Nagot, Joubert, Power, Kohlmann, Chevalier Keating, &c.

II. Religious Orders of many—the only account in English: The Jesuits, Sulpitians, Redemptorists, Brothers of the Christian Schools, The Sisters of Charity and Mother Seton, The Visitation Nuns and Miss Lalor, The Sisters of Providence and the Rev. Mr. Joubert, The Ladies of the Sacred Heart and Madame Gallizin, The Ursulines, Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of St. Joseph, School Sisters of Notre Dame.

III. Memorable Events—The Negro Plot, Father Kohlmann and the Confessional, The School Question, The Native Riots in 1844, "Maria Monk" and anti-Catholic Forgeries in General, The Trustee System and Attacks on Catholic Church Property, The Know-Nothing Excitement, The Mission of Archbishop Bedini, The First Nuncio.

This work before publication was submitted to persons of high rank in the Church in each diocese treated of, and approved by them.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

It would not be easy to find elsewhere or anywhere as much interesting matter connected with our history, as is here brought together.—Pittsburg Catholic.

The most complete body of facts in connection with the progress of Catholicity in this country that has yet been published.—N. Y. Herald.

The Catholics of the country owe Mr. DeCourcy a debt of thanks.—Freeman's Journal.

A welcome book to our increasing literature.—Catholic Mirror.

A most valuable book, whether we consider it as a book of reference, (so far far as it goes,) or as furnishing a great amount and variety of information for a more compendious work of some future historian.—Catholic Herald.

Written in good temper, it avoids personalities and overwarmth of expression.—N. Y. Times.

WILLIAMS & GUION'S

Old Black Star Line of Packets. 1856.

Passage from any part of Great Britain and Ireland, secured at the lowest possible rates by this old-established line, sailing from Liverpool to New-York every five days, comprising the following magnificent Ships:

Ships.	Captains.	Tonage.
AUSTRALIA,	Smith,	2,000
BRIDGEWATER (new),	Barstow,	2,000
CULTIVATOR (new),	Austin,	2,000
CYNOSURE,	Bray,	2,000

THORNTON (new),	Collins,	2,000
TICONDEROGA,	Boyle,	1,400
UNIVERSE,	Cave,	2,000
VANGUARD,	Norton,	1,800

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of the departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; or persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

NOTICE.—The recent failures, by which a large amount of Bills remitted from this country to friends in Ireland, has been returned unpaid, afford to this Society the opportunity, and at the same time impose upon it the duty of informing the public, that such losses would have been prevented if the parties purchasing Bills had availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Society.

For the purpose of entire protection a fund is constantly kept on deposit in the Bank of Ireland, against which this Society issues its drafts, payable at sight (from sums of £1 sterling and upwards), on the Bank and all its branches, and has thereby for the last Ten Years afforded a mode of remittance perfectly safe and unquestionable.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, New-York, Aug. 13, 1856.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That the following ordinance, relative to express wagons, carts, cartmen, &c., &c., having been adopted, its provisions will hereafter be enforced.

FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

AN ORDINANCE

To amend an Ordinanae entitled "An Ordinance for the licensing, and otherwise regulating the use and employment of express wagons, carts and cartmen, &c., &c., approved by the Mayor June 2, 1851."

The Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New-York, in Common Council convened, do ordain as follows:

That section 2 of said Ordinance, relating to carts and cartmen, be amended, so as to read as follows:

SECTION 2.—The Mayor shall from time to time license and appoint so many and such persons as he may think proper, to set up and keep public carts in said city, Provided, that no one person shall be so licensed to keep more than three such public carts.

And he shall also license so many and such persons as he may think proper, to be public cartmen of said city, and he may revoke or suspend any or all such licenses at his pleasure. All persons licensed as foresaid, to keep public carts, shall be deemed to be public cartmen, within the meaning of this Ordinance; but it shall not be lawful for any person to receive or to hold a license to keep public carts, or to be a public cartman, unless he be a citizen of the United States, and resident within the State of New-York, and is the actual owner of the cart or carts, with good horses therefor, so licensed to be kept as public carts; and the Mayor may examine, under oath, all persons applying for or holding any such license, or the renewal thereof, touching their qualifications as aforesaid, and all licences other than to persons so qualified shall be void.

Adopted by the Board of Councilmen, May 9, 1856.
Adopted by the Board of Aldermen, July 15, 1856.
Approved by the Mayor July 30, 1856.

European News.

The Canada, from Liverpool to Boston, brings European dates to the 12th December. The news is devoid of general or political importance. Attempts to patch up the treaty of Paris by another conference, form the staple rumors of the day.

The steamship America, which left Liverpool on the 5th inst., and the arrival of which we have been expecting for a week past, encountered a furious storm when off Cape Clear, which swept her decks, and so disabled her that she had to put back to Liverpool, where she arrived on the morning of the 10th inst. The Canada was immediately got ready to take out the passengers and mails of the America, and left Liverpool as above indicated, Dec. 12.

The Canada reports the following ships at anchor at the bar on the 12th inst. :—New World, Baltic, John Howell, Belmont, and Wm. Rutledge; also reports passing on the 13th inst., fifteen miles westward of Fastness, the steamship Niagara, and on the 7th inst., in lat. 49, lon. 28, the American ship Syphon, bound west. A despatch from Bordeaux announces the arrival at that port of a vessel having on board the captain and fifteen other persons who were wrecked in the ill-fated steamship Lyonnais. No names or other particulars are given. A subscription has been opened in London for the widows and children of those who perished.

The ship Adriatic, Combes, from Liverpool to New-York, was wrecked on the 8th inst., near Dungarvan. Three men were drowned, but it is not reported whether they were passengers or crew. The vessel was likely to become a complete wreck. She had a full cargo, and 200 crew and passengers. It was thought that if the weather moderated the cargo in the between decks might be saved.

There was a ship at anchor near Wexford, with her masts cut away—supposed to be the J. L. Warner from New Orleans for Liverpool. The latest accounts stated that the Warner was still ashore, that her crew had been saved, and that her cargo would be if the weather moderated.

The ship Annie, from Quebec, grounded on the 5th inst., and was discharging her cargo outside the harbor of Aberystith. The Lalla Rookh, for Charleston, had put back to Liverpool with loss of sails.

There had been a succession of severe gales along the British Channel, with numerous casualties in the Channel.

The steamer Troubadour, bound to Dublin, was caught in a gale short of fuel, and to keep up the fires had been obliged to burn up 150 pigs in the furnaces.

GREAT BRITAIN.—A deputation from the Liverpool and London merchants had waited on Lord Clarendon to ascertain what is meant by the British demonstration against New Granada.

Father Matthew died at Cork on the 9th inst.

Felix Orsini, the Italian exile, was lecturing in London on Italian tyranny. Richard Cobden has published another letter on maritime law. The London Times has an editorial backing out of the Arrowsmith Georgia Railroad and revolver hoax. It is reported that Arrowsmith has returned to the United States. Dr. Livingston, the celebrated African traveller, has reached Marseilles on his way homeward. The corporation and citizens of Portsmouth have subscribed £1,000 to give a banquet to the American officers in command of the British bark Resolute. The naval service at Portsmouth contemplate a similar compliment.

Moussoul Bey, on the part of the Pacha of Egypt, had an interview with the Manchester Commercial Association on the subject of growing cotton in the district watered by the river Tigris.

The British government is about to lay a telegraph line across the Persian Gulf.

FRANCE.—It is rumored that Cardinal Moriot's mission to Rome relates to the coronation of Napoleon, which, should peace be consolidated, will probably take place early next year. A formal announcement has appeared in the Moniteur that the Congress of Paris will re-assemble this month. It is now reported that the Plenipotentiaries will be the same as before, Count Walewski representing France; Lord Clarendon England; Count Cavour Sardinia; and Ali Pacha Turkey. The Havre Journal has a Cayenne letter of November 5, stating that gold had been discovered in several parts of the colony. Many shipping casualties are reported from the Mediterranean.

SPAIN.—Madrid commereial letters say that the opinion was strongly against the new loan, and that the finance minister would probably resign.

Accounts from Madrid and Saragossa represent these cities as still agitated, although not in open outbreak.

PRUSSIA.—Prussia has communicated the resolutions of the Germanic Diet on the question of Neufchatel prisoners to the great Powers, inviting them to join in a collective decision, with a view to secure her recognised rights. It is likely that the Prussians of Neufchatel will have been judged by the time an answer to this circular is received; but as the Federal Council of Switzerland is said to have given a formal promise to the Cabinets of London and Paris that an amnesty shall be granted immediately after, the preliminary condition demanded by Prussia will be fulfilled, though indirectly. In the course of the negotiations on the question France and Austria have advised Prussia to abstain from military measures, but have promised positively to support her views.

AUSTRIA.—The Emperor has consented to the convocation of the Protestant Synod in Hungary. The papers are full of accounts of the Emperor's visit to Venice.

ITALY.—The Baltic carried the intelligence that an unsuccessful attempt had been made to assassinate the King of Naples on the 8th inst. The announcements of the affair differ. The first announcement said :—At noon to-day there was a review, and while the troops were defiling, a soldier of the third battalion of Chasseurs rushed from the ranks and struck the King on the left side, knocking him down. The soldier was seized by Colonal Lalour. Another dispatch says :—The bayonet of the soldier struck the King on the right side, above the waist. A third despatch intimated that he was slightly wounded, and a fourth despatch that the soldier fired his carbine at the King, and that the would-be assassin was killed on the spot. The telegraphs from Italy are wholly in the power of the government, and hence the accounts of the affair are not reliable. The accounts from Palermo say that the insurrection which broke out there on the 22d ult., at the head of which was Baron Benhenda and a number of ex-Deputies of the Sicilian Parliament, had been suppressed, and that Baron Benhenda had been taken prisoner. From Messina everything is reported as being quiet. The police had seized a quantity of muskets which had been landed for the insurgents. Count Levatolli, an eminent liberal of the Roman States, had been assassinated at Ravenna.

TURKEY.—The dates from Constantinople are to the 1st inst. The Ministry of Reschid Pacha was well established.

RUSSIA.—The text of the note addressed by Russia, at the end of October last, to the Powers that signed the treaty of Paris has been published. It is accompanied by a circular demanding the re-assembling of the Congress. This circular contains an exposure of the steps taken by the Russian Cabinet with a view to the fulfilment of articles twenty and twenty-one of the treaty of Paris. As regards the Isle of Serpents, the Russian government says that the island was incontestably in possession of Russia before the rupture with respect to the Bessarabian frontier question. The memorandum mentions two instances of concession by Russia with regard to the course of the Upper Yalspuk and Bolgrad. The memorandum defines the view of Russia, and states that the map from which the frontier line was defined at the Paris Conferences was supplied by the French government. The memorandum also states that Count Walewski asked Baron Brunow whether the Court of Russia would abide by the majority of votes at the coming Conference, and that the Russian Cabinet had telegraphed an immediate reply in the affirmative, and hence that Russia was blameless for the present difficulty. We believe, says the Debats, we are able to state with some certainty, that England in entering the conference, distinctly declared that she would conform to the decision of the majority, whatever it might be. The relative position of the disputants is no secret. On the one side is France, Russia, and Prussia, and on the other, England, Austria, and Turkey. In the middle is Sardinia, which coincided occasionally with the opinions expressed by France. It is now stated she is oscillating between the two.

PERSIA.—The last despatches inform us that the alleged capture of Herat was still doubtful. The conferences opened by the English embassy with Ferouk Kean, appear likely to detain the latter at Constantinople for several months. The personnel of the English embassy had left Teheran. The statement that Russia had demanded from the Shah of Persia permission to occupy the territory of Moganis, is confirmed. There is also by way of St. Petersburg a doubtful report that 50,000 Russian troops under General Bernloff, are ready to march to the frontier of Persia on the first invitation of the Shah.

MISCELLANEOUS.

By direction of the assignees of Messrs. Strahan, Paul, and Bates, Messrs. Plews and Wall offered at public auction, at the Mart, a number of policies of assurance on the lives of Sir John Deal Paul, Mr. Bates, and others. In the course of the sale the auctioneer stated, in answer to some remarks, that the bankrupts were then at the Model Prison, Pentonville, and he had been informed some time since, on what he believed to be undoubted authority, that they would not be sent out of the country, but they would, no doubt, soon get a ticket of leave, for he believed they deserved it. Eleven policies of assurance were sold for £8,362. The sale was well attended, and for some of the lots considerable competition took place.

Of all the seventy vessels that were scuttled or sunk in the harbor of Sebastopol between September 22 and February 17, there have been only one steamer, the Chersonese, and a few transports, raised; the result of the examination to which the others have been subjected by divers shows them not to be worth much expense being bestowed upon them. The ships of the line which were sunk at the entrance of the harbor had already been ten years afloat, and have now been imbedded in the sand there for two winters, so that they certainly cannot be worth much.

During a recent gale of wind in Holyhead harbor, causing a heavy sea, nearly two lengths (or about sixty feet) of the staying on the northern backwater were carried away. Several logs of the timber were found floated to the opposite side of the bay the following morning. This will occasion a serious loss to the contractors, and the weather continues unfavorable for pitching out additional lengths for depositing stones for extending the breakwater.

Douglas Jerrold, the famous English satirist, commenced his life as a printer's devil; and his first literary attempt, like that of Franklin, was written during his hours of leisure, and dropped into the copy-box of his employers as anonymous correspondence.

Mr. Thomas Underhill, of London, was killed at the Lime-street station of the London and North-Western Railway, near Liverpool, by leaping out before the train was brought to a stand-still.

The Parliament of England has been further prorogued to the 3d of February, then to meet for the despatch of public business.

The cost of sending the German Legionaries, with their families, to the Cape of Good Hope, is estimated at £800,000.

The Electric Telegraph Over the World.

From the London Post.

Benjamin Franklin was a man of acquirements in advance of his age. Studious of the nature of lightning, and versed in the science of electricity as then known, it was he whose sagacity first detected their affinity, and who, in 1752, first applied conductors to the protection of buildings, and his invention will be a constant safeguard to property to the end of time. He too took a prominent part in the War of Independence; he negotiated the treaty of alliance between the United Provinces and France which involved that country in an American and European war with Englaud in 1778, and probably led remotely to the great revolution of 1789; he signed the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain in 1783; and, first Minister from the new Republic to the mother country, received from George the Third the emphatic assurance that, as he had been the last man in England who had acknowledged its independence, so also he would be the last man to dispute it. But Franklin died in 1790, long before the heats incidental to that struggle which freed his country had subsided, and very bitter feelings prevailed between the two countries during the latter years of his life. But what would the father of electrical science have said if he had known that there were children in the world which he was leaving who would live to see the day that all England rejoiced that such was the triumph of science that the salute which inaugurated the 4th of July in New-York might be fired by English engineer officers in London?

Yet it is even so. In no great number of months the galvanic wire will connect England with the New World, and early in 1858 the electric current will carry a message or fire a gun across the Atlantic with a velocity that allows no appreciable measure of time. Wonderful as the project is, it is no mere speculation; the thing has already been accomplished. Already submarine telegraphs, concentrated in London, traverse St. George's Channel to Dublin, the North Channel to Carrickfergus, the Straits of Dover to Calais and Ostend, and the North Sea from Orfordness to the Hague. Nor are other countries behind hand—the Little Belt, the Great Belt, and the Sound are traversed by a line to Karlscrona, which connects Sweden with the rest of Europe. France communicates with her Algerine Governor by a line which passes from Spezia to Cape Corso over Corsica and Sardinia to the neighborhood of Tunis, and thence to Algiers by land. Even the inhospitable Euxine has received the beneficent messenger, and many an anxious mind has been relieved by telegraph from Balaklava to Varna; whilst preparations are being made to communicate in the same manner with Malta, Constantinople, Alexandria, Aden, and thence to Kurrachee, where it is to be connected with the Indian system.

The line which is to connect the New World with the Old, is to commence at Cork, and along its proposed route to St. John's—a distance of one thousand six hundred and eighty miles—the bottom of the sea is a plateau or long continued bank, as discovered by Lieutenant Maury in 1853, and so eminently suited as the resting-place of the submarine cable, that it has been called the telegraph platform. It is of a tolerably uniform depth, not more than has already been successfully encountered during the greater part of its extent, though deeper near the Irish coast than the shores of Newfoundland, and about two or three miles in breadth. This bank is composed of a bed of the most minute possible shells, so small as to be scarcely distinguishable by the naked eve, and of such a delicate and beautiful structure—apparently kindred to those microscopic shells which form some of our chalks and marbles—as to prove the complete stillness of the water at that depth. Indeed, it is well known that the disturbance caused by the waves, even of the most violent storm, ceases at a depth comparatively trifling. St. John's is two or three days nearer England than Halifax; and now that a dangerous reef, called the Merlin Rock, at the narrow entrance to the harbor—eighteen feet below the surface at low water—has been skilfully and successfully removed by the order and at the expense of the company, the largest steamers in the world can with safety pass in and out of that land-locked harbor, which possesses abundant facilities for coaling first-class steamers. Crossing Newfoundland to Cape Ray, the cable is laid down across the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cape North, whence, traversing Cape Breton Island, it is carried to Halifax, whence it distributes messages over the whole continent of North America. Amongst the most remarkable events of the age in which we live, will be the changes effected by this new agency of intercommunication. Rapidly as steam has bridged the Atlantic—however soon as we may expect a still greater rapidity of interchange of correspondence arising from the improved construction, and, to a certain degree, increased size of ocean steamers—still there will, some time or other, be reached a limit to the velocity with which these huge bodies can be moved—which limit, indeed, cannot be very far distant; and however great the rate of speed might be which science may hereafter command, it would still leave the great commercial world of America at a disadvaniage as regards its trade compared with the nations of Europe.

The facilities which this line will afford to commerce in the rapid interchange of orders and information, the certainty it will give to mercantile calculations, the comfort it will bestow upon severed friends and relatives, the pacificatory effect it will have upon diplomatic relations, by making it possible to settle difficulties almost before they arise—at all events before they are known to exist—are incalculable; but the area over which its influence will extend in North America may be measured by the fact that whilst at the end of 1852 the total length of electric wire in the United States amounted to 24,375 in March, 1854, according to a report presented by Mr. Shaffner to the Telegraph Convention, the total length of electric telegraph was no less than 41,392 miles; and from that increase, of more a thousand miles a month, we may fairly infer it now greatly exceeeds that enormous estimate—the expenditure upon which has been $6,671,800, or about £1,400,000. The Electric Telegraph Company's system in the United Kingdom, at the termination of the half year ending June 30, 1854, comprised 26,988 miles of wire, and the number of messages transmitted during the previous six months, amounted to 372,474. A curious but convenient peculiarity in the transmission of messages will arise from the difference of longitude—New-York time being about six hours behind London. It, follows according to the arrangement at present contemplated, that the messages which are forwarded from London from ten in the morning till four in the afternoon—our business hours—though they arrive simultaneously at the other side, do so, according to their time, between four and ten in the morning, and at their ten o'clock these replies until four will reach this country between four and ten in the evening, leaving them the whole night for consideration or obtaining information before our hours of activity recommence at ten in the morning. The cable will be itself 2,500 miles long, to allow for slack, and will be divided into two lengths, each on board a separate vessel. The ships will meet half way at a point previously fixed on, and having connected the two ends of the cable, will steam away, one towards Ireland and the other towards Newfoundland paying out the cable as they go, and intechanging signals all the way.

The Ports of New Granda to be Blockadbd by a British Squadron.

From the London Times, December 1.

Instructions will go by the mail of Monday to the Commader-in-Chief of the naval station at Jamaica to establish a blockade of the ports of New Granada, on the Spanish Main, in consequence of the government of that country refusing to carry into effect, after being repeatedly called on to do so, an agreement formally concluded with a British subject—Mr. James Mackintosh. Forbearance, it is known, has been carried to its utmost limit, not only by our present Foreign Secretary, but by his predecessors in office, in their dealings with this and the other Central and South American Republics, owing to the allowance made for their immaturity and the peculiar circumstances of their position. But, with the exception of Chili, which has pursued an honorable course, such as to cause its securities to take a leading rank in the European Money markets, they have almost all sunk to a depth in which every reliance upon their good faith has been extinguished. Each act of spoliation submitted to has merely been the precurser of something worse, until, relying upon their weakness and the indisposition of the British Government to use coercion, their treatment of British claimants has been such as to cause the sufferers constantly to contrast their own position with that of citizens of the United States under similar circumstances. It may be hoped that the course now adopted in the case of New Granada will exercise a wholesome influence, especially on Venezuela and Mexico.

Russian Preparations to Support Persia against England.

The following appears in the Warsaw journal, the Czar, of the 30th ult. :—"While England, with much noise and ostentation, prepares an expedition against Persia, Russia, unostentatiously and noiselessly, is getting ready to come to the succor of the Shah. The Orenburgh corps d'armee has been considerably reinforced. It is commanded by Aide-de-Camp General Peroffski. The outposts of this corps extend to the very limits of the country of Turan, upon the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes; and the military flotilla of the Lake of Arel, placed under the orders of the same General, is brought by the above mentioned rivers to the frontiers of India. On another side, great activity reigns upon the Caspian Sea and in the army of the Caucasus. Transport vessels, having troops and war material on board, pass incessantly between Astrakhan and the port of Bakou, situated in the province of Shirvan, bordering on the Caspian Sea, belonging to Russia, and at the frontier of Persia. The new Lieutenant-General of the Caucasian provinces, Prince Bariatinski, has received fuller powers than his predecessors. He has lately inspected, on its way to its destination, the flotilla of the Caspian Sea, which has been considerably increased and partly left at his disposal. This flotilla can easily take troops on board either of the corps of Orenburg or the army of the Caucasus, and take them to the relief of Persia, disembarking either at Astrabad or upon the neighboring coast of Teheran. The corps which forms part of the army of the Caucasus, cantoned at Shirvan and Erivan, and commanded by General Khruleff, who distinguished himself in the Eastern war, can also succor Persia by land as well as by sea. Meanwhile the Russian Government neglects nothing in replacing the war material consumed during the late war, and continues to refill the exhausted magazines.

Correspondence.

Kilkenny Letter.

KILKENNY, December 12th, 1856.

Since last I had the pleasure of writing to you, I have been among some of my old friends in the upper part of our County. Many old scenes met my view, and many were the reminiscences called up by the sad aspect which things now wear. Yet, despite the worst that famine could accomplish, or those accursed sectarian doctrines which misgovernment never fails to propagate—neither, nor both combined, can ever make Ireland aught else than the Green Isle! To be sure, were there a beneficial Government, its beauty could be enhanced a thousand fold; but even now, when the landmarks left by the famine are, and will for a long time be painfully perceptible, all is still beautiful and endearing to the eye—beautiful, as though no ruthless hand had, for centuries, endeavored to strip off the garments in which Nature has so generously decked her.

There, for instance, is the vicinity of Freshford, through which I passed. What a Paradise it might be made. Yet, notwithstanding its ample demesne and magnificent mansion—embosomed in stately woods, which extend along for miles, on either side—it was for years cursed with an imbecile absentee landlord. Of course, the estate came under the hammer of the Encumbered Estates Court, and was knocked down to one of the English cousins of the infamous Sadleir. Yet, though the halls of some of the old tenantry have been deserted, and few have been found to kindle anew the bright fires which burned on the hearth-stones, the May-pole—in the middle of the Square—stands, and the magnificent Chapel—for the erection of which the good Protestant Rector, Rev. Luke Fowler, in his own Church, in presence of his congregation, has more than once eulogized the devotion and zeal of the Catholics of Freshford—with its superb front of finely-cut blue limestone—from the exhaustless quarries of Belville and Ballylarkin—towers grandly above the old village and the woods.

By the way, Mr. Paris Anderson (now I believe resident in America,) criticising the architectural beauty of this grand Chapel, designated it as "appertaining to the Barbaric order." Not understanding how the term could be applied to it, I made application to the Parish Priest, who kindly showed me the plans furnished by Mr. Dean Butler, the Dublin architect, but even from them I could not solve the question. I next tried at the principal shop of the village, but just as I was going to inquire, a little girl pushed in before me, asking for "a dozen of the best Angels." A dozen of the best Angels! This completely obliterated Mr. Anderson's "Barbaric order" from my mind. The shop-boy, however, with the utmost composure folded up a dozen of those angelic representations usually tacked on each side of a coffin; while I, confounded at the village with a Chapel of the Barbaric order, and a shop selling Angels by the dozen, rushed out.

In this locality I met an old friend, Mr. Murray Maher, the brother of our respected County Coroner, who returned from America some months ago. With him I had an interesting conversation, concerning the adopted home of so many of Ireland's sons. He had been through many of the States—particularly your Western ones—during the past ten years, and had returned to Ireland for the purpose of having an operation, for removal of cataracts which have injured his eyesight, performed by some of our Dublin surgeons. I fear he will never sufficiently recover to return to America. Amongst other things which he delighted me with was the warm hospitality which the Irish in New-York, and its vicinity, keep alive amongst themselves. His description was, to say the least, a pleasing one—one, too, which he seemed pleased with narrating. After his ten years in the West—where little social life can be had to cheer the laborer—he said, it was a new life to him to meet some of his oldest friends, and to find them—when their day's labor was over, coming together and cordially enjoying themselves after the fashion of the good old times of Ireland. Nor did they confine their social circle to Irish exclusively, for he said there were Americans amongst them, with bright flashing countenances, flinging their brilliant repartees—worthy of the fatherland of Franklin, and Henry, and Randolph. When he told me of their coming thus together—without reference to creed or politics—it was then I felt, no wonder these Irish-Americans should be watched so sedulously by a hostile English Press—no wonder that the howling fanatics of Exeter Hall—who took Mrs. Stowe to their bosoms, though she said their Shakespere "blew himself to shivers"—should be so bitter against them, when they find—notwitanding the woe they have experienced for past ages at home—once they emerge from the effects of fanaticism and misrule—they rise, and beckoned by the genius of America, shake their hands at their old bickerings—saying they were a curse—and unite lovingly together!

It was my fortune to have for my companion on the public-car an old friend, Mr. Lawrence J. Denn, at present the Clerk of the Urlingford Poor-house. To you, I need hardly say, that some of the most brilliant minds of Ireland have been obliged to toil through the direst calamities for their daily bread. Nay, more, I think you will go with me a step farther and say, 'tis because the flame of Genius has shot some of her transcendent beams on their brows, they are doubly doomed to the want from which ignorance and knavery so often emerge with golden coffers. There was poor Edward Walsh, the author of some sweet and musical ballads which appeared in the Nation prior to the eventful year of '48, obliged to accept the wretched office of School-teacher to the young convicts on Spike Island. It was just the same with my poor friend, when he accepted this office in Urlingford, which is far below what his acquirements would deserve.

One of the famous places which I visited was the Spa Hill, near Johnstown, to which, long ago, not only the people from the remote districts of Ireland, but from all parts of Europe, used to flock to drink the salubrious waters which spring from the interstices of its black rock. At those times, Ireland had her manufactures, and Kilkenny employed hundreds of brawny arms in the manufacture of her Blankets and Friezes; but now, since it is become more fashionable to wear English and French woollen goods—since Irish woollen goods "would hardly warm one"—of course her Mineral Waters should not be compared with those of Cheltenham or Biarritz. Yet, notwithstanding the "fashions of the day" have rendered the ample chair so long filled by old Katty Loughman—the dispenser of these waters—a useless situation, I for one can't forget all the brilliant writings of the most eminent Medical men in Ireland, proving its superiority to all other European Mineral Springs. Nor were they content with prose writing, for old Dr. Sherridan wrote the following verses about the Spa:

All you who would refine your blood,
As pure as famed Llewellyn,
By waters clear, come every year,
To drink at Ballyspellan.

If lady's cheeks be green as leek,
When she comes from her dwelling;
The kindling rose within it grows
When she's at Ballyspellan.

As to local news, there's scarcely a word—at least there's scarcely a word of good news—save a rumor that our Member, Sergeant Shea, is likely to obtain a snug berth from the British Government, which will cause a vacancy for the seat for the County. Should this prove true, some say the Hon. Mr. Ellis—a sprig of the nobility—will again aspire to the position for which, in one of my former letters to you, I nominated Geo. Bryan, Esq., of Jenkinstown. Should Mr. Bryan take the stand, the electors would indeed recall the days when they sent the English Hume, without the expense of one shilling, as their representative to the British Senate, if they did not triumphantly elect the grandson of old Major Bryan.

Concerning the other Elections we are likely to have, I know very little more than that there is not one candidate who would be likely to reflect credit on the constituencies. The Kilkenny Journal is out on the subject (without referring to Kilkenny itself,) and enumerates Clonmel, Downpatrick, Bandon, Athlone, and, probably, the city of Galway. The Journal makes mention of the different candidates about to solicit favors from the electors, speculates on their several chances, and winds up with—"Alas! for Ireland that she has no patriotic sons to contest these seats. All are despairing, and patriotism is at the lowest ebb."

Both our local papers are each week filled with discussions on this accursed Souperism which has raised such a ferment amongst us. I hate these sectarian bickerings, so I shan't go between the Journal and the Moderator (there's, unfortunately, neither moderation nor toleration on this vital point), but will away to my matins, as becomes—

ST. CANICE.

THE ANGLO-FRENCH ALLIANCE.

From the Dublin Nation.

It must be true, for everybody says it—even the Russian organ begins to bewail with an aggravating irony—that the Anglo-French Alliance has come to an end. The French journals, without an exception, save one, the Siecle, have declared war against England; even the Journal des Debats bays deep-mouthed thunder across the Channel this week. France is a country where words come to blows rather rapidly. The government of Louis Napoleon too, is one under which, malgre the tone of independence taken by the Constitutionnel, so sudden and systematic a change in the whole tone of public opinion does not occur by accident or by spontaneity. For his Imperial Majesty is himself like Mr. Disraeli, a gentleman of the Press, and edits his own official organ. Under his regime, as under that of all all despotisms, the Press, while curbed in its freedom and vigor, gains in authority and significance—for it writes what is suggested by the State, or what it knows very well will be agreeable to the State—and leaders take the place of diplomatic circulars. We may therefore reasonably conjecture that the writers of Paris know they are indicting what will be exceedingly agreeable at the Tuilleries, as well as fragrant in the nostrils of the French public, when they return with their long-stifled vigor to the denunciation of perfidious Albion.

But this is not all. While decision is pending on the question of convening a second Conference, and England mournfully apprehends that, owing to the base desertion of Sardinia to the Russian side, she and Austria will be defeated—behold the first symptom of the new French Alliance! Russia and France have, it is said, called upon Austria to evacuate the Principalities. Russia and France act together at Vienna. Russia and France act together at Constantinople. Russia and France will be immediately acting together at London. It is a strange Alliance, this of the two Powers most formidable in the world for the strength of civilization and the strength of barbarism—yet, as we reflect that whatever is not Russian in Russia is French, the alliance seems far more natural that of England. All his life, Napoleon seemed fasinated, and yet shrunk from that idea—as if he felt that in the end, the star of Peter should eclipse his own.

His nephew appears to be disposed to give another trial to the English—and a trial that will try that jealous nation's patience. M. de Persigny has paid a visit to Lord Derby—Mr. Disraeli is on a visit to Paris. In revenge for the reflections made upon his Ministers, it would appear his Majesty is disposed to insist upon Lord Palmerston being dismissed from power—and in compliment to the British people, who are supposed to be ruled by themselves, so far cultivates the constitutional course as to consult the Opposition. The meeting between Louis Napoleon and Disraeli, who always held he would be "the future Imperator," must have been affecting. But the Emperor remembered, doubtless, that it was the Derby Ministry which actually formed the Alliance with him, now loosened by Palmerston—before whom his last grand Parliamentary battle looms apparently in these conjunctures.

He is likely, for the present, to carry Parliament with him, against Louis Napoleon, Benjamin Disraeli, and all the rest of the world, but he will carry War with him too.

WHAT THE POPE HAS DONE FOR ROMAN ANTIQUITIES.

John Francis Maguire, writing from Rome to the Cork Examiner, under the above caption, says :—

That Pius the Ninth has done much for the antiquities of Rome, no one who visits Rome and looks around him with a vigilant eye can venture to dispute. Pius the Ninth has reared another gigantic buttress at the other end of the Collosseum, thus placing a limit to further decay—it might be for centuries to come. Besides this most important undertaking, he effected many beautiful restorations—namely, reproducing in travestine, or in brick, the same color as the old material, several arches with their simple and chaste but most beautiful decorations. Pius the Ninth has done much more than this,—he has improved on the example of his illustrious predecessors, and enabled the visitor to ascend the better preserved or loftier side of the building to within some twenty or thirty feet of the top, or about 125 feet over the leve of the arena. On the very spot on which many a martyr stood in the days of the more cruel of the Cæsars, a Cross is now reared aloft, and, following the beautiful outline of the arena, are placed, in niche-like altars, representations in fresco of the various stages of the Passion. At half-past three o'clock on Fridays and Sundays a procession may be seen winding its way beneath the entrance arches, preceded by a cross-bearer and two acolytes. A Franciscan Friar, clad in the coarse habit of his order, with sandalled feet and the white cord encircling his waist, walks in front, supported at each side by two members of a religious confraternity, whose ordinary dress is completely shrouded in a gown and cowl which leave nothing visible save the feet and the eyes. Other members of the confraternity follow. Then comes the procession of women, many of them ladies of high position, three in front, with a crossbearer in the centre—and as they walk they chaunt in simple but not unmelodious tones the hymns belonging to the particular devotion which they perform. The Franciscan then ascends the platform, from which he delivers a short but most impressive discourse, which is listened to with the greatest attention by the congregation, usually consisting of 100 persons of both sexes—the men standing on one side and the women on the other. The large crucifix is placed beside the preacher, and enables him to produce a powerful effect in addition to that created by his own earnestness and eloquence. The concluding appeal is invariably heard and responded to by a kneeling audience. The sermon concluded, the procession is again formed, and goes the circuit of the arena, chaunting sacred hymns while in motion, and stopping at each altar to recite the appropriate prayers belonging to each station of the cross. Even the most indifferent cannot hear these pious strains echoing between the arches and along the corridors of this great monument of Pagan pride and cruelty without some emotion, certainly not without associations of the past.

Thanks to the care of the Pope as well as to other causes, the Collosseum may be now safely enjoyed at a time when most strangers love to visit it—by moonlight—not in a spirit of romantic yearning, but because they know it presents a very beautiful appearance when so illumined.

I have only incidentally hinted at some of the other services which the Pope has rendered to the antiquities of ancient Rome.

Even in distant Benevento, a Papal town in the midst of the Neapolitan dominions, the Arch of Trajan has been isolated by the removal of houses on two sides, and its ancient sculpture brought fully to light.

Then the Pantheon, which owes its almost miraculous state of preservation to its fortunate conversion into a Christian temple nearly one thousand years since, has been freed, in a great measure by the present Pope, from the vulgar incrustation of mean buildings which had been built up against its eastern side. It has been carefully protected from further encroachment by a wall and iron pallisade, and the old level excavated and kept in excellent condition. Several of the great arches which form so striking a feature in the antiquities of Rome, including those of Constantinople and Septimus Severus, have been protected from one most formidable danger which menaced their safety—namely, the accumulation of water that came down from the Celian and Esquiline hills. Then every foot of the Forum Romanorum speaks of the solicitude of his Holiness for the preservation of its precious relics. He has undertaken and completed costly excavations, brought to light the base of several beautiful pillars, adopted precautionary to uphold tottering walls and pillars, and, perhaps, the most valuable work of all, has had collected and perfectly restored splendid pieces of frieze and cornice that once adorned the portico of the temple of Castor and Poelux. These restorations are a noble benevolence to the arts.

Then the Pope has lately unveiled the long hidden mystery of the Appian Way, which stretches for miles beyond the walls of Rome, and was the famous promenade of the ancients, who beheld the proud tombs of their ancestors on either side. In the progress of this great work of excavation many rare and beautiful things have been discovered, all of which have been carefully placed in the public museum, to enrich still further collections, unrivalled in interest and almost inappreciable in value. The tomb of Tarquina has been recently saved from the destroyer, the waters being prevented from penetrating the interior and injuring the old Etruscan figures which adorn its walls. Amongst the excavations and discoveries lately made might be mentioned those on the Palatine Hall, where, in the Palatine Garden, other traces of the Imperial Palace have been made vsible, together with fragments of richly sculptured friezes, as well as part of the old walls of Romulus brought to light. In fact, on the mere antiquities alone, not at all including purchases for the galleries, no less a sum than 14,000 scudi was expended in the year 1855 —the gross expenditure of that year on works connected with the ancient and modern art, including renovations of various kinds, amounting to 244,000 scudi. This amount showed an excess of 37,000 scudi over that of 1854. For the year 1857 a much smaller sum is proposed, because of the pressure resulting from the general failure of the harvests; but so dear to the Holy Father is the work of restoring and preserving the monuments of Pagan antiquity as well as of Christian art, that 60,000 scudi have been demanded for the following year.

THE MILITARY RESOURCES OF IRELAND,

WITH A SYSTEM OF ARMAMENT, PLAN OF ORGANISATION, AND MODE OF WARFARE, ADAPTED TO THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE COUNTRY.

BY CHARLES BEGGS.

The present aspect of affairs over the greater part of the world is portentous, at no distant day, of fierce convulsions and great organic changes. The relations of England with France, Russia, and America, are checkered with signs boding no good to that state. Russia is laboring with all the power she possesses to sever the alliance between France and England, and burns, in the event of her success in this particular, to enter into a war single-handed with the latter; America awaits an opportunity to annex the Canadas and the West Indies to the United States; while Louis Napoleon, that subtle and perjured despot, quietly bides his time, waiting for a fair opportunity to obliterate from the crest of France, the black indelible stain of Waterloo with English blood, the only detergent fluid that can utterly irradicate that dire stigma. Without one single friend, England stands alone, encircled by an ominous galaxy of potent and external foes, each one, under an assumed exterior of amity, calmly measuring her strength, and silently contemplating her ruin. They all seek her alliance, it is true, when they need it for the purpose of the moment; that purpose served, they relapse into their usual quiescent antagonism; while, owing to the precarious state of her internal affairs, her very existence as a nation, depends upon preserving peaceful relations with each of these states. Such at present is the anomalous position which Britain occupies; and, from the unsound and artificial state of her social system, the resources of the country in an extended sense, and a large portion of her community for their very subsistence, depend upon her mercantile relations remaining uninterrupted. It is obvious that a war waged against her by any of these states, of which there is every possibility, would, if not result in her immediate destruction, at least would mark her declension, when her downward career of rapid retrogression would commence. Generally, the people of all other nations are chiefly sustained by agriculture and the manufacture of the produce of their own soil, and depend principally upon the custom of their own countrymen for its disposal; but, unfortunately for England, a great number of her people solely exist by the manufacture of the produce of other climes, and both these and the mercantile community rely upon disposing of a very large share of these manufactures to the inhabitants of the colonies and foreign states, and also for receiving their supply of raw material and provisions from them; hence the interruption of her commercial relations—which would be the result of war—would deprive large masses of Englishmen of the medium of earning their bread, and ruin her merchants, the greater part of their property being always on the wave, an easy prey to privateers of marque, and thereby inevitably lead to a fearful and disastrous social revolution. In the last war the commercial relations of England were but slightly impeded, because, in that war she had, I may say, the world for allies; but in the next war she stands in danger of having the world, if not openly, at least covertly allied against her. With a national debt amounting to $775,314,694, up to the 31st December, 1855, the interest on which alone annually swallows up $23,267,361 of the public revenues, taxation would soon become intolerable.

These considerations calmly weighed, leave us no other alternative than the prediction of the utter prostration of England occurring sooner than most people imagine. And in anticipation of a circumstance of such solemn importance, it becomes a very natural and a very serious question, what would become of Ireland? Whether should she become an independent state, and feel herself for the first time fanned into vigorous nationality by the healthful breezes of disenthralled freedom, or sadly and sullenly bend her hoary head beneath the yoke of Russia, or France, or the United States? If it can be shown that she would, in the event of the fall of England, be able, in despite of her alien foes, to establish and maintain her independence and freedom, it would truly be the interest and the duty of her sons, with armed hands and warm hearts, to woo and win for her that position amid the nations which God and nature intended her to occupy. If not, motives of humanity would suggest to her the dire necessity of submitting to decennums of slavery, rather than shed the blood of her best and bravest sons in vain.

But, in the ascertainment and survey of the military resources and capabilities of Ireland lies the full and complete solution of these all-important questions. Therefore, acting under the influence of these considerations, and believing the necessity for doing so to exist, I feel desirous of presenting to my countrymen, for their information and advantage, a complete analysis of the unparalleled military resources of this country, and of the invincible power of which they are so amply possessed, to successfully confront and triumphantly repel any foreign invader, however powerful, who may dare to approach us influenced by conquest. In this undertaking I do not presume to be wiser or better than anybody else; but seeing a great and necessary work to be done, and seeing nobody doing it, at last I have resolved upon discharging that duty myself.

The military resources of Ireland may, in the abstract, be comprised under four denominations, namely:—Firstly, her insular position, and the peculiar texture, produce, and configuration of her soil, and the advantages arising therefrom. Secondly, a good commissariat. Thirdly, a sufficient male adult population, capable of bearing and wielding arms;—men ever form the chief and primary bases of all armies, and the first and greatest element of all military resources. Fourthly, arms and munitions of war. Any nation in being gifted with these great martial attributes, may indeed be justly termed a great military nation; and that Ireland is amply entitled to that proud appellation, I will make as clear as noon day.

The delineation of the superficial features and physical conformation of Ireland for military purposes properly belongs to the science of military geography; a science that reveals to the military student the basis of all military strategy, and is the very first and most essential branch of knowledge to every man aspiring to figure on the field of Mars. The general who is incapable of adapting his systems of strategy and tactics to the superficial peculiarities of the scene of operations is unfitted for command; and the army whose armament and tactics are not those which the nature of the ground would determine, would be utterly unfitted to cope with the one more perfect in these all-important particulars. For instance, in a country thickly studded with low hills, or intersected with quick-set ditches, the army composed of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, would be unequal and inferior to an army simply composed of riefmen and pikemen, because the range for artillery would be short, neither elevation nor depression could insure effect in firing, and a cannon ball would do no more execution than a rifle bullet, and could only imbed itself in the nearest ditch or hill without doing any injury; while, from under cover of the same ditch, the rifle marksmen would, while in security themselves, shoot down the artillerymen, who, in being obliged to stand by and man their guns, could not avail themselves of cover, and therefore the guns would be dismantled, and thus rendered an easy prey to capture. The cavalry really could not operate, because they could not charge up uneven hills or through hedged ditches, and if the infantry in either line or column attempted to do so, a death-groan would be their heartfelt response to the wild charging cheer of the opposing line of pikes. In woods, bogs, and on all craggy or very uneven surfaces, and in well and thickly enclosed countries, neither artillery nor cavalry can operate; while, in comparison with them, riflemen supported by lines or columns of pikemen are quite at home, and naturally become endowed with all the principles of superiority, because the very superficial nature of the arena forms the predominating component part of that superiority.

The St. Louis Democrat of the 18th ult., publishes the census returns of that city for the year 1856. They were furnished by the Deputy Sheriff. The Democrat thinks the estimate of floating population given, as far below the mark; and is satisfied that the population does not fall short of 150,000. A large class of our population follow the river and many who dwell in the city occupy stores and other buildings where it is impossible for the census takers to come at them. The tables exhibit the following facts:—

Total free white population	122,313
Free colored persons in the city	1,239
Slaves in the city	1,649
Fixed white and colored	125,201
Estimated floating population	15,000
Total population	140,201

The free white male and female population of the city is thus enumerated, as respects age and numbers:

Males, under ten years of age	17,019
Ten years of age and under 18	7,146
18 and under 21	2,394
21 and under 45	34,873
45 and upwards	2,753
Total males	64,817
Females under ten years of age	18,108
10 years of age and under 18	7,251
18 and under 21	4,032
21 and under 45	25,571
45 and upwards	3,164
Total females	58,126

Out of the whole population of the city there are but 15 deaf and dumb persons; of these five are males and nine are females, whites, and one black. The number of blind is 55—33 males and 22 females; and 14 insane persons—8 males and 6 females.

The St. Paul Advertiser, in an article on the Fur trade of Minnesota, says: The trade is almost entirely limited at present to the Pembina or Red River regions, and around the head waters of the Mississippi. The buffalo robes come almost entirely from this source, the buffalo ranges being restricted to the region north of the Cheyenne, and west of the James River. The Minnesota River country has fallen off in buffaloes very considerably—the whole receipts for export from that region not amounting to more than 1,200 robes. This does not include, however, the large numbers reserved for home consumption. The table given below, for which we are indebted to N. W. Kittson, Esq., exhibits the total exports of Furs from St. Paul for the present year: 64,292 rats, $11,572,56; 8,276 minks, $18,621; 1,428 martin, $3,570; 1,045 fishers, $4,702 50; 876 red foxes, $1,005; 3,400 coons, $2,550; 10 wolverines, $25; 364 badgers, $91; 2,032 wolves, $3,048; 405 otter, $1,417 50; 586 beaver, (pounds,) $882; 2,542 kitfoxes, $1,271; 610 bear skins, $6,700; 20 cross fox, $100; 8 silver fox, $400; 50 lynx, $125; 7,500 robes, $41,200. Total, $96,750 50.

Mr. Samuel Davis, one of the oldest merchants of Boston, died in that city on the 19th ult., at the age of eighty-one years. Mr. Davis was a native of Newburyport, but has resided in Boston since year 1804. He was for many years a jeweller at the corner of Washington and Milk streets. In early life Mr. Davis was an apprentice to the famous Jacob Perkins, one of the most ingenious mechanics our country has produced.

In 1833, says the Clevelander, after a long and severe spell of sickness, Stephen A. Douglas left Cleveland on a canal boat in search of a home and fame and fortune. He was then young and poor and unknown. Twenty-three years had passed away, and he returns to the same city with a world-wide reputation—an abundance of wealth—and is received by the roar of cannon and the loud huzzas of his party. Energy and industry will do much for man in this country.

It is said that parties have been for some time in correspondence with the Cuban and Spanish authorities for the privilege of laying a telegraph line between Cuba and the United States. It is proposed to lay a cable from the point of Cape Sable to the extreme southern point of Florida, to Havana, the distance being little over 70 miles—about the same stretch as that across the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The Boston and Providence Railroad Company has declared a dividend of 3 per cent., payable January 1st.

The Salem (Massachusetts) Gazette of the 16th announces the decease of Mr. Thomas Norsworthy, of that city, who was nearly one hundred years of age. He was born in Devonshire county, England, May 7, 1758, and came to this country in 1816, previously to which he had served twenty years in the British army, under Lord Wellington and other officers, in India, Russia, Prussia, Spain and the West Indies, and for eleven years he was in the British navy, under Admiral Dockworth and other officers. He was engaged in sixty-five battles during these thirty-one years, and escaped without the loss of a limb.

James M. Beebe, Esq., President of the Board of Trade, Boston, lately gave an elegant entertainment to George Peabody the American banker. The company was large and distingue, and among the number were Hon. Edward Everett, Governor Gardner, McKay, the Dutch historian, Captain Gibson, of Dutch East Indian celebrity, Judge Merrick, Bishop Eastburn, Bishop Fitzpatrick, Rev. Drs. Blagden, Neale, Robbins, Waterbury, Anderson, and others of the clergy.

At the last meeting of the American Pomological Society, Col. Wilder, the President, stated that Catawba Brandy (made exclusively, we think, at Cincinnati,) has been purchased at five dollars per gallon, for exportation to France, for the purpose of flavoring foreign liquors.

The news from New-York concerning Walker's situation in Nicaragua caused much excitement in New Orleans. Walker's agents are very active there, and it was expected that a large number of recruits would sail for San Juan, by the steamer to leave on the 27th.

The schooner Louis A. Surette, from Boston for Argyle, went ashore at Cranberry Head on the 26th ult., and went to pieces. The captain and one of the crew were drowned. The remainder of the crew and passengers were saved.

Mrs. Susan D. Connor, wife of the late Commodore David Connor, died at Toroney, Devonshire, England, on the 3rd of November. Her remains will be taken to Philadelphia for burial.

A man and his wife are now living in Pawtucket, Mass., who have been the parents of twenty children, nineteen of whom were born in that town, and seventeen are now living. The father is forty-five years of age, and the mother forty.

The Glasgow Daily Mail says that one of the £1,000 subscribers in that city to the Atlantic Telegraph enterprise is Mr. Thackeray.

The Lowell News states that George R. Jackson, a shoemaker by trade and a believer in spiritualism, was conveyed to the State Almshouse at Tewksbury as an insane person.

James McDonald died at Port Stanley, C. W., on the 23rd ult., at the advanced age of 102; his wife, 100 years old, still survives. He was the oldest Presbyterian in Canada.

The President has brought into market 1,500 acres of land, lying in the north part of Iowa, which has caused an active demand for land warrants, at an advance of 3cts. per acre.

At the recent term of the Court of Common Pleas, held at Plymouth, 12 persons, convicted of liquor selling were sentenced to the House of Correction.

The New Orleans Delta does not consider the newspapers of Boston worthy of notice.

There is superb sleighing above Manchester, New-Hampshire, to Canada.

Amongst the numerous and attractive Balls to come off during this month, none deserve a more cordial support or will confer more unalloyed pleasure on those who accord it, than the following:—The Young Men's, at Niblo's Saloon, on the 6th, for the benefit of the poor little Catholic Orphans. The Guyon Cadets', at the Assembly Rooms, on the 7th. The Meagher Club's, at Tammany Hall, on the 12th, and the Montgomery Guard's, at Niblo's Saloon, on the 27th.

On the 21st of December, John I. Coddington died at his residence, No. 228 Fifth Avenue, after a protracted illness, in the 73d year of his age. Mr. Coddington was a native of New-Jersey, and came to this city a poor lad in the year 1785. He commenced business as a wholesale grocer about the year 1800, and the firm of Smith and Coddington was an important one in the trade, and had a branch in the city of New-Orleans. The location of the firm was in Front street, near Beekman. For many years, and up to the year 1828, Mr. Coddington officiated as a director in the Bank of America. About that time he suspended payment, on account of an unfortunate commercial speculation, but afterwards honorably fulfilled all his engagements. He was an active politician and a warm Jackson Democrat, and in the early part of Old Hickory's administration he was elected to the State Legislature, where his services were deemed so valuable to the party that he was made City Postmaster, in place of Mr. Gouverneur, by General Jackson. This position he held until the end of Mr. Van Buren's term of office. During this time the Post-office was in the rotunda in the Park. By judicious investments in real estate, he acquired a large fortune, and was supposed to be worth over half a million of dollars at the time of his death. His bequests to the charitable societies were large, especially to the New-York Hospital, which owes to him a large tract of ground near Bloomingdale. John Lorimer Graham was appointed by Mr. Tyler as Postmaster, and since his deposition Mr. Coddington has not taken a very active part in politics. He was, however liberal in his contributions to the party, and was once on the Democratic ticket as a Presidential elector. He sympathized strongly with the barnburner democracy during the continuance of their quarrel with the hunkers, and in the last Presidential contest supported Mr. Fremont. His funeral was solemnized on Wednesday afternoon, 24th inst., at 3 o'clock, at No. 228 Fifth avenue.

The New England Society celebrated the 236th anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrim fathers by a banquet at the Astor House. Thomas H. Benton made a speech on the occasion laudatory of the people of New England. Speeches were also made by Mr. Hoxie, Dr. Storrs, William C. Bryant, Arthur Gilman of Boston, R. O'Gorman, Mr. Fillmore of the London Times, and others. Letters were read from George Peabody, N. P. Banks, Mayor Wood, Mr. King, Governor elect, John M. Botts, and other distinguished gentlemen. The affair was a very pleasant and agreeable one. A junior association of New Englanders in New-York celebrated the day by a supper and ball at the Lafarge House.

The President has officially recognised Richard Mullowney as Consul of the Republic of Paraguay for New-York.

Irish News.

In the case of Levington versus O'Connor, tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, on the 5th ult., the plaintiff obtained a verdict against the defendant for £200, for services rendered by his wife, as interpreter. It appeared from the statement of Mr. O. Hogan, plaintiff's counsel, that the defendant had, some time ago a cousin—Miss Julia O'Connor, of Paris—a lady of rank and fortune, who died in Paris, leaving by her will a considerable legacy to him, and that Miss Julia O'Connor had a sister, a Mrs. Tuite, who was a lady of great respectability, formerly resident in Ireland, but who unfortunately had been confined for a series of years in a Maison de Sante, or lunatic asylum, at Lyons, in France. Mrs. Tuite, who was entitled, under a deed of separation, to a large income in Ireland, was indebted in a considerable amount to Miss Julia O'Connor, but being said to be a lunatic, and consequently unable to assert her rights, it became, in a double sense, the interest of Mr. O'Connor, the defendant, to release that lady from her miserable condition. It would seem that Mrs. Tuite was not a continuing lunatic, although she had been for a long time in confinement, but being largely indebted to the deceased, Miss Julia O'Connor, and the payment of that lady's legacy to the defendant being more or less dependent on the realization of the debt, it was of the utmost importance to the latter that Mrs. Tuite should be freed from the lunatic asylum. The defendant, through the instrumentality of a mutual friend, a member of the bar, applied to Mr. and Mrs. Levington, who resided in Paris, to undertake the duty and responsibility of finding out all that could be found out about Mrs. Tuite. In reply to a communication to that effect, Mrs Levington wrote to the defendant stating that her husband had given her permission to undertake the matter, and on the 30th of October, 1855, an answering letter was sent by the defendant, wherein he accepted the tender of services on the part of the lady, and indicated the views he entertained and the means by which he proposed to carry out his purposes. Through the exertions of Mrs. Levington, Mrs. Tuite was liberated, and is now living in Ireland, and in receipt of £1,203 a year.

At a recent meet of Lord Fermoy's hounds at Knockeen, the cover of J. G. Nason, Esq. near Lemlara, the fox broke away to the north, and in a short time the body of the pack were in pursuit of him. He went straight for the covers of Noble Johnson, Esq., at Cooliquane, passing through them he went away to Ballyready and Ballyglissane, to Kilshanig, through the extensive woods of that place, and leaping the demesne wall, crossed the river Bridge, below the bridge of Rathcormack, and bore away for the rock of Castlelyons. The pace being too much for him, he was compelled to take shelter in a limestone quarry, into which the hounds hunted him in most sporting style, and killed him. He proved to be an old dog fox. The field at the "find" was numerous, but the line taken and the pace were much against all those gentlemen who (though well mounted), did not know the country. The distance run was nearly ten miles, which was done in forty minutes, including a short check at the commencement.

One of the last of the mythical line of "Irish Giants," in the person of "Shawn Nabontree," died at Connemara, Galway, on the 28th of November. He owed his soubriquet to his unusual stature, being a man of extraordinary athletic symmetry—namely, seven feet in height, and weighing over twenty stone. His family the "Joyces," have been for many years one of the wonders of Connemara, about whom tourists have "spun long yarns," as the representatives of the "Giants of the West," which their stature and proportions induced the belief that the "Joyce country" contained such specimens of the human family. He died at the age of seventy, and has left four stalwart sons, as worthy representatives, who boast that their kindred were never conquered by the Sassanach, yet Death has been more victorious.

Speaking of the Navan great winter fair, the Dundalk Democrat says: "There were several cattle dealers from the other side of the channel, who purchased largely for the English markets, at prices which must leave good profits when again sold, and a large number from Belfast, Newry, Dundalk, Drogheda, and Dublin, who bought both horned stock and sheep at high prices, As a proof of the vast amount of business transacted, we may mention that the Dublin and Drogheda Railway Company despatched from the Navan station during the day, no less than forty wagons, heavily frieghted with black cattle, sheep, and pigs, the produce of the finest county in Ireland.

At the Police Court in Limerick, his Worship the Mayor, encountered a wag who, for the manner in which he palliated the commission of a crime, with which he was charged, was by his Worship good-naturedly acquitted. "What is your name?" said his Worship, smilingly taking a synopsis of the seedy picture on the table. "Jim Murphy, yer Riverence." "Why did you go and get intoxicated?" "Well, plase yer riverence, my wife, d'ye see, happened to be confined, an' I felt so glad that I wint an' took a 'sup,' an' was thin confined myself" (laughter). Jem, being ordered to go home and eschew the "sperrits" for the future, took his conge of the bench, expressing many thanks for his safe deliverance.

The concert, says the Limerick Observer, advertised in our columns, will take place at the Theatre Royal on the 12th Dec., when the Irish prima donna will again revisit this, her native city, and home of her childhood. The charming cantatrice will, no doubt, receive that reception which is due to her high professional talent, for already all the reserved seats have been engaged for the occasion. Having, since her last tour through England, visited various climes, the Nightingale of the West returns to Limerick crowned with chaplets of fresh laurels from every quarter where she was received with boundless enthusiasm, and where her rare and brilliant qualities were fully appreciated.

The return of Michael Galway, Esq., R. M., to his residence at Abbeyfeale, after leave of absence for some time, gave rise to a general rejoicing in that locality. The inhabitants, to show their respect for this gentleman and family had the town illuminated. There were several displays of fireworks during the evening, which very much enhanced the rejoicings. The entire of the surrounding hills, to the distance of several miles, had also been a continuous vivid flame.

A correspondent writing to the Dublin Freeman says that Sir James Chatterton, whatever may be his politics, is a chivalrous and gallant soldier, and is about to receive the reward of his Peninsular services in the shape of the colonelcy in chief of the 12th Lancers, the regiment in which he first entered the army.

The barque Thora, from Liverpool, for St. Thomas, was run into by a two-funnel steamer, name unknown, off the Tusker, and was exceedingly damaged. The barque has arrived in Waterford for repair.

For the first time within our memory, says the Dublin Nation of the 6th ult., complete victory has crowned an honest Journalist, defending himself in a court of law against a prosecution designed to cripple or crush the liberty of the press. On last Wednesday, twelve jurors on their oath, a true verdict to give according to the evidence, declared that the Wexford Guardian did not libel Mr. M. P. Howlet, in designating him "a philosophic vagabond, who had roamed through many lands," with "change of profession as various as the climes he had passed through—now a Churchman, then a Mediciner." Moreover, these same twelve men on their oaths, declared that it was not libel to say of this Mr. M. J. Howlet, that he was "a booby who did not know how to lie respectably," nor yet to suspect that Mr. M. P. Howlet, the advocate of place-begging, "would sink his present profession in a snug government berth," for that "the character of a hungry apothecary (Mr. Howlet being in this "line," avers that—for reasons best known to himself—this hit was most injurious of all) was never much admired even in Shakespeare."

At an early hour on the morning of the 1st ult., about a quarter of an hour before the departure of the 7 50, a. m. up-passenger train from the Limerick terminus, for Dublin, Cork, and Waterford, a most Providential discovery was made by a man named Downes, a gauger at Killonan station (only 4¼ miles from Limerick), who, upon examination of the rails at that point, found that the "points had been blocked" with stones, and having called the prompt attention of the station-master to the circumstance, the rails were at once properly adjusted. This discovery was most fortunate, else the up-train would have met with a deplorable accident, similar to the fatal occurrence which took place at Dunkit, with the lamentable particulars of which the public is acquainted.

It is becoming a prevalent opinion, says the Dublin Nation, that the British Government in order to facilitate the abolition of the Irish Viceroyalty, have given instructions to their functionaries at the Castle so to administer affairs as to bring the institution into general odium and contempt. Accordingly they have appointed a Lord Lieutenant, expected to be the last of his line, who according to one of the dull wits of the Lodge, cheerfully spends all his time in conjugating the reflective verb "se jackasser."

Mr. Love, reports the Dundalk's Democrat, formerly a slave in one of the Southern States of America, delivered two lectures recently in the Assembly Rooms, Dundalk, to large audiences. He gave ample details of the position of the slaves in America; described his own escape from bondage, and made such an impression that there was no one who heard him, who would not wish to see slavery abolished, and wiped root and branch from the face of the earth. We understand Mr. Love intends lecturing in Newry, and we bespeak a kind reception for him there.

On the morning of the 4th ult., a Dublin steamer named the Sylph, on her passage from London to Falmouth and Dublin, ran into a Dutch galliot off the Foreland. The night was very dark, and it is reported that the galliot had no lights, but that the steamer had. The galliot was partly cut down, and in ten minutes after the occurrence she sank. The crew consisted of six men and a boy, and out of these only four men were saved.

A vacancy having occurred in the rank of Head Constable in the North Riding of the county of Tipperary; the Inspector General has directed that twenty Senior Constables shall attend at the Constabulary office in Dublin, to undergo a competitive examination, in accordance with the regulations lately adopted for the grade referred to.

At the recent sale in the Incumbered Estates Court, of the county Waterford, property of John Kelly, Esq. stradbally three tenant farmers on the estate succeeded, after considerable competition, in purchasing the fee-simple of their several holdings. A few years ago those farmers were in very struggling circumstances, but "tempora mutantur!"

Lord Ashton and Frederic C. Trench Gascoigne have intimated their intention to the Rev. E. D. H. Knox that they will subscribe a sum of 50*l.* towards the building of a chancel and the general embellishment of Kilflynn church, in the county of Limerick, upon which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are about to spend a sum of several hundred pounds in remodelling.

The Great Southern and Western Railway Company have given notice of their intention to apply, in the ensuing session of Parliament, for a Bill authorising the construction of a railway from a point upon their own line near the town of Tullamore to Athlone, where it will join the Midland Great Western.

BATTLES OF THE IRISH IN THE BRITISH SERVICE—TIPPERARY TACTICS—BATTLE OF CHILLIAN-WALLAH.

BY J. H. STOZQUELLER, ESQ.

"The air was calm and still, when a deafening roll of drums and a clamor of bugles summoned us to our appointed stations. The bivouac fires were still smouldering, marking where part of our army had passed the night—the last night for many a man of them in this world—but the heavy masses of dark infantry might be seen moving silently onwards, and the plain, on the eventful morning of the 13th of January, was marked by a cloud of dust.

"The position occupied by the Sikh army was a formidable one; its left centre was strongly posted in the village of Russoul, which was separated from the front chain of their batteries by a ravine of considerable extent; all the approaches were defended by strong batteries, and the space between our position and Russoul was filled by a broad belt of briery jungle.

"As our line advanced, some deserters made their appearance with the offer of information, upon which, however, it was felt it would not be expedient to rely; and, when we halted at a small place called Chota Arurao, the whole line was distinctly visible.

"Lord Gough had almost made up his mind to suspend any further operations for the day. Orders were issued to mark out the ground for our encampment, and the men were in the very act of falling out, when a flash of fire, followed by a loud report, was seen, and a cannon shot rolled close to where the Commander-in-Chief was standing with his staff.

"'By Heaven!' said his lordship, 'that is an invitation we cannot decline;' and, shutting up his telescope, he ordered the batteries to open their fire.

"Our heavy guns had been advanced well to the front, and in ten minutes the roar shook the very ground beneath our feet. Nor were the Sikhs idle; their balls came whistling through and over our ranks, sending many a man to his last account. The atmosphere was, indeed, so dense by the smoke, that accurate aim was out of the question. The only marks for our artillery were the lurid jets of flame as they proceeded from the enemy's guns; and our men went down by hundreds beneath that tremendous cannonade. The officers stood in little groups, whispering together that this sort of work could not last long. The fire was every moment becoming more deadly, when a staff officer galloped rapidly up to Sir Colin Campbell's brigade, which was directly in front of Shere Sing's guns.

"'You must carry that battery with the bayonet; nothing but cold steel will do.'

"'Now then, my lads, at them!' shouted Sir Colin; and, waving his hat in the air, he led them on to the assault.

"But cold steel was of little avail against a withering fire of grape. The round shot tore up the leading files, and the bravest soldiers went down in hundreds before that deadly tempest. All that valor could do was done, but in vain; our men wavered, and the Sikh horse fell upon their left flank completing the work of destruction.

"Meanwhile, the simultaneous attack made by Sir Walter Gilbert, with the flank movement under the command of Colonel Rosse, appeared to be more successful. They gained possession of the ground, but soon a cloud of cavalry fell on their flank; a brigade of infantry, and nine guns opened a deadly fire on their rear. The attacking party was completely outflanked, and the two brigades were separated. Christie, who had command of the Horse Artillery, unlimbering his guns, was preparing to fire, when the fatal order of "Threes about!" was issued, no one knows by whom, and down came the Fourteenth in full retreat; one gun was knocked over, another rendered useless; they dashed on at full gallop, knocking over everything that came in their way, and the gallant Christie, with most of his troop, fell, sword in hand, under the guns which he died for, but could not save.

"Then arose a scene of confusion, such as no British soldier, it is to be hoped, will ever see again. Huish went down, and a gigantic Sikh was raising his sabre for the final blow, when a pistol-shot from Major Stewart killed him. Men and officers were trampled in the dust; the Adjutant-General was cut to pieces; colors were desperately fought for, and seized by the enemy.

"But at this terrible moment, the Second European Regiment and the Seventeenth Native Infantry saved the fortunes of the doubtful day. They charged the Sikhs who were advancing upon Dawes' battery. Then Dawes, limbering up, dashed at them, burst through their line, and capturing their guns, spiked them on the spot. Having gained the summit of the ridge, he halted, and unlimbered his guns in the face of a tremendous fire. His gunners went down in dozens; he himself was severely wounded, but he held his ground, and in twenty minutes silenced the battery, and so saved this division of the army from destruction.

"The remaining division of the army was, meanwhile, hotly pressed by the enemy. The very air seemed teeming with bullets—it was like a storm of leaden hail—nor was there a moment's respite. The iron masses of the Sikh horse bore down upon them, inspired by the success of their former charge. The batteries poured in a torrent of grape, and there was every prospect of that division being utterly annihilated, when Colonel Fane, with his battery, some troops of the Ninth Lancers, and a few of the Sixth Cavalry, came to the rescue, and retrieved, in some degree the fortunes of the day.

"The charge of Mountain's Brigade had been more successful. They stormed the entrenchment against which the attack was directed, in the face of a deadly fire. The Twenty-ninth Regiment succeeded in spiking several guns, and sustained heavy loss.

"Moving in parallel with this brigade, went one whose destiny was far less fortunate. It was under the command of Gen. Pennycuick. As it neared the brushwood, a deadly fire opened upon them, which, trusting entirely to the bayonet, they did not return. The front ranks were thrown into confusion, and the gallant leader, while in the act of rallying his men, fell sword in hand in front of the guns. Then Brooks, waving his sword over his head, led on the men; mown down by hundreds, they passed on, with a courage nothing could daunt. They captured the battery and were in the very act of spiking the guns, when some regiments of the Hunnoo force, lying hid in the brushwood, came suddenly upon them. Then commenced a fearful slaughter. The enemy gave no quarter. Brooks fell covered with wounds. The senior Major was shot through the lungs, and most of the officers perished miserably in the jungle.

"The combat was now tremendous, and at that moment the position of our army was most critical. The attacking parties had been repulsed with dreadful slaughter, and the fire of the enemy was unabated in fury.

"Thackwell, on the extreme left, with White's Brigade, and the Artillery, under the command of Colonel Brind, held in check Outar Sing, who made several ineffectual attempts to turn our left flank, and a strong body of Sikh horsemen, galloping forth in compact array, seemed to menace us with a charge.

"The scene was now one of overwhelming excitement. The dark masses of the enemy seemed dashing down upon us, when Thackwell, riding along our line, where the Fifth Light Cavalry and the Third Dragoons were stationed, pointed for a moment to the advancing foe, and shouted—

"Forward! Close up! Charge!

"The word was scarcely spoken, when, with a loud cheer, we went at them with the speed of a whirlwind. A heavy matchlock fire was opened upon us, and saddles were emptied by the dozen. On we went—a crash—a roar—a cheer—swarthy visages scowling upon us—a struggle—the flashing of steel—we were in their ranks, and in another instant we were through them.

"'Well done, lads!' said the Colonel; the blood trickled from a wound in his temples as he spoke, and his sword was crimson.

"But we had done our work too well. We had broken the line, and carried away by the maddening excitement of the hour, we were beyond it, and the dark mass we had just penetrated, was forming once more in our rear.

"'At them again, my lads!'tshouted Unett, waving his cap in the air—'Third Dragoons—Threes about—follow me!' and setting spurs to his charger, he dashed once more at the enemy's columns.

"So sudden was our charge, so irresistible the impetus of our assault, that we were upon them before they were prepared. A terrific struggle, but a most unequal one, now ensued.

As the cavalry of the enemy gave way before us, they threw in a withering fire; hand to hand we fought our way; Thibet and Magnan were both wounded, and fifty of our men went down.

At this moment Brind's guns opened their fire upon the retreating ranks of the enemy. The carnage must have been terrific, for the long breaches in their lines showed where the squadrons of the cavalry had passed, or the round shot of the artillery had gone through them.

"That part of the day's work was at least well done.

"For the first time during the action, I now saw Lord Gough. His snow-white hair was streaming in the wind, and his face appeared flushed with excitement, as he rode up to the Twenty-ninth Regiment, which was close by us at the time, under the command of Congreve, my friend the tall Major, with another brother officer, being on horseback in front.

"I was not near enough to hear what he said. After a few minutes' conversation with them, he rode away to the right.

"'Well, Major, how much longer will that last?' I shouted.

"'Hard to say. Are you hit?'

"'Only a scratch.'

"The charge was a good one. But at this moment an aide-de-camp galloped up, and the gallant twenty-ninth had soon success in their own hands.

"It was a day of ill omen. Fought on the anniversary of the last massacre of our troops at Cabul, from the commencement its fortunes seemed beset with peril. The loss was deplorable; nor did the havoc cease when the fight was over; many of our wounded were cut to pieces where we had been obliged to leave them in the rear. One of my messmates was shot close to my side, but with the exception of loosening a shoulder-knot, I escaped untouched.

"Comment is now worse than useless. The memory of our disaster has been obliterated by subsequent glory. But it would seem abundantly evident that, had the artillery been allowed to do their work at the commencement, much of the catastrophe might have been averted. The bravery and determination of the enemy can only be equalled by their unexampled ferocity. They neither gave nor expected any quarter. The gashes inflicted by the tulwar, beneath the stroke of which our steel was shivered to splinters, were frightful. To oppose living bravery, however well drilled and organised, against batteries vomiting forth streams of fire, with any hope of success, is, to say the least of it, a most unfortunate error; and to have undervalued an enemy who fought with the coolness and accuracy by which the Sikh has always been distinguished, appears unaccountable. Single combats, in this eventful day, were of no unfrequent occurrence, and in these the Sikh soldier not unfrequently had the advantage. The weapon with which he is armed has a broader back, a thicker blade, as well as a keener edge, than ours, and affords him a signal advantage. Any attempt to record the feats of individual daring which occurred would be impossible. We fought as English soldiers always fight, but we were overborne by a tremendous power, and all that can be said of the fight at Chillianwallah is, that it may perhaps be regarded as a drawn battle.

"The morning which followed the memorable battle of Chillianwallah was one of the wettest I ever remember. About 8 o'clock the rain began to fall in torrents, and continued to descend during the greater portion of the day. The night had been one of intense anxiety; once or twice during its tedious progress, an alarm was raised that the Khalsa horse was upon us; at one time so prevalent was this impression, that the gunners of Huish's Brigade were ordered to unlimber, and they were in the very act of firing when it was providentially discovered that he had mistaken a party of the Third Dragoons for the enemy; they were wandering about in search of food and water.

"Nor can there be much doubt that, if the Sikhs had followed up their advantage by a vigorous attack during the night, our army, exhausted as it was by the conflict of the day, as well as the marches which preceded it, would have suffered terribly. But they lost the opportunity. Daylight came at last, and never was its dawn more welcome.

"At an early hour the Commander-in-Chief, surrounded by his staff, rode forth to reconnoitre; and the hopes of some, who were sanguine enough to hope the enemy would have retreated during the night, were doomed to be disappointed. The Sikhs still held the ground they had occupied on the day preceding. Their long range of tents, with the camp fires burning in front of them, were distinctly visible about two miles in our front.

"The wounded horses lay thickly on the field, and their moaning mingled with the feebler cries of human pain. Fancy may conceive the horrors of the scene, but all description must fall short of reality. Friends and foes lay mingled together, the bleached aspect of the English dead contrasting strangely with the swarthy hue of the native soldier. It was the war of race against race, and divided in life, their union was consummated in the grave at last. The field was literally strewn by military equipments and instruments of war. The surface of the plain—trodden down by the cavalry, and furrowed deep by cannon wheels—was covered by relics of the fight. Helmets and cuirasses, shattered fire-arms and broken swords, Prince Albert hats and Lancers' caps, Sikh bonnets and tulwars, uniforms of every description, loose plumes and accoutrements, drums and bugles, attested in ruinous display, to the awful severity of the struggle.

"In many places the dead lay three deep upon each other, and where the 24th Regiment had been so terribly cut up, upon searching the field, the colors, which were missing were found wrapped round the body of the officer who had carried them.

Were it possible to heighten the melancholy appearance of such a scene, it would be by attempting to describe the researches of the living, as they occupied themselves in paying the last mournful tribute which affection could bestow on the gallant dead. The bodies of the two Pennycuits—the son having fallen in defence of the father's body—were found, and, having been placed in a litter, were borne away. While I was gazing at the mournful spectacle, and occupied by the melancholy reflections, it could not fail to inspire, I heard a footstep behind me and a hand was laid on my shoulder; it was the tall Major.

"'Come along,' he said, 'this is sad work. They are going to bury poor Christie.'

"'Where is he lying?'

"'Close by here. The men asked leave to have him buried in the same grave with the rest of the troop who fell.'

"I followed the Major in silence as he led the way to a tree which stood at a little distance; near it was standing a group of officers and men. A pit had been dug, which was already full; close by a cap and a large blue cloak lay on the grass. We looked at each other in silence; the fate which had been his might have been ours. No one spoke until, in clear and deep tones, the chaplain began to read the solemn service for the burial of the dead. It was a touching scene—the mournful desolation and stillness of all around, the fixed countenances of my comrades, the melancholy looks of the men, as the chaplain, his head uncovered, read the well known words, which came with an awful solemnity home to us all."

ART IN THE SOUTH.

From the New Orleans Delta.

The Delta has advocated, long and earnestly, the cultivation of a characteristic literature in the Southern States, as one of the first and most obvious steps towards their intellectual emancipation from the trammels of Northern prejudice and bigotry. Its efforts, like those of John C. Calhoun, Gilmore Simms, Mr. Marshall, of Vicksburg, and other prominent individuals interested from time to time in the cause, have not been altogether successful; but something has been done—some good seed sown—some honest work achieved—and as year follows year, and necessity compels the adoption of a comprehensive Southern idea, the original scheme which many persons considered chimerical at first, may become a wholesome and honorable fact.

What we have said of literature during the five or six years gone by in the columns of the Delta—a small portion of which has been realized in our regular Sunday issue, of which we are not a little proud—is equally true of Art in the conventional meaning of the word. We cannot boast of many painters or sculptors in the South; in music we have achieved no inconsiderable success; but the delicate chisel and many-colored palette are almost unknown among us. In the hurry and scramble for money our cities, where Art can be supported alone, have forgotten themselves, have neglected their real interests, have lost sight of the Beautiful, which is only a synonym for the good, and consequently suffer from the anarchy and crime which periodically prevail in Louisville, Baltimore, and New Orleans. Even sedate and quiet Charleston, where the last remnant of true civilization—the duello—is still recognized, has done very little for the real intellectual life of her citizens. She has plenty of politics, but where are her paintings? She has a fine sense of scorn for her enemies, but where are her sculptors? We ask the question not for the sake of the alliteration, but in all sincerity and earnestness. In this wonderful nineteenth century, it appears, we require little or no Art—machines will suffice. And yet, admitting that Morse is a great inventor, would another Moore be unwelcome; or that Hoe manufactures unequalled Power Presses, would a second Hugo be de trop? We have Crystal Palaces and raree-shows (as the children call them) of every size and shape; would they be disfigured by the cartoons of a new Raphael, or the arrangement of their light and shade impaired by a stray suggestion from a modern Rembrandt? "A room hung with pictures," said Sir Joshua Reynolds, truly and finely, "is a room hung with thoughts;" and his aphorism can be extended and applied to a city with equal propriety. Our friend of the Opera Box, whom we greet parenthetically, will doubtless agree with us in this opinion.

These observations were suggested to us (as the clergymen say) by a visit some days ago to the studio of our neighbor and friend, Mr. Powers, an artist of whom our city has reason to be proud. A passing glance at his works convinced us that we have the elements, what Bacon would call the principia, of genuine intellectual work in our rough and somewhat headlong city, and a remembrance of the graceful fancies of our young friend Baker and of the efforts of Mr. Perry—a most promising student—confirmed us in the opinion. The studio in question is as plain, square, unassuming and well-lit as the character of the man who owns it. Nothing pretentious—nothing showy about it, like the Osgood rooms, which used to dazzle our fair dames three or four years ago; but everything in good order and good taste. A cheerful fire, pleasant pictures, educated talk—that is all we expected to find, and we found it.

Mr. Powers has spent the last two years in Italy and France—dreaming, working and studying in the great galleries, passing from sunny city to city, breathing the quiet atmosphere of European life, without forgetting the wild and weird beauty of his native land. He did not travel as a mere idler in search of a sensation—not as a James Harthouse, who "went in" for Jerusalem merely because it was Jerusalem—not as a gossip-collector or a plagiarist from the guide-books—but as an earnest student, observing, pondering, learning, with a frank spirit and a fearless eye. He has returned and settled down to work again, having brought with him many valuable reminiscences, fixed on strained canvas, of the pleasant scenes amongst which he moved and thought.

There, for instance, is the modern Roman matron, with her meek, over-worked look and somewhat quaint and peculiar headgear. The woman of to-day, very different, it is true, from the Lucretias or Cornelias of the "good days of old," which Macaulay sings so stirringly, but still the woman of to-day. We are face to face with a portion of nature; what care we if the face be sublime or not? We want the truth, and in this "study from life" we find it. Further on, you meet some other Italian women, not very poetical, but exactly the women who spin all day (for they have an inexhaustible distaff) while their husbands devour maccaroni and bask in the sunshine. We do not pretend that these works are master-pieces; some of them are actually unfinished; but they are very welcome to us in their naturalness and simplicity.

Yonder is a portrait of the artist's namesake—Powers, the sculptor—Powers of the "Greek Slave"—a fine, earnest head—hopeful, healthy and well-balanced; a clear, out-looking eye, quick to catch the salient points of an object, and capable, at the same time, of becoming introspective and looking within. Beside it is the "counterfeit presentment" of a Kentuckian gentleman—a poet and a thinker—residing at present in Florence; a very excellent painting, and, we presume, a capital likeness. There are many other sketches and fancies worthy of attention, but we have not leisure to enumerate them. It must be sufficient to say that a visit to Mr. Powers' studio will not be time or attention thrown away.

Answers to Correspondents.

We have received the following note from our accomplished friend, late Editor of the Citizen:—

NEW-YORK, Dec. 29th, 1856.

MY DEAR MEAGHER:

For the information of such of your readers as may be friends of mine, will you be kind enough to state in the next number of the Irish News, that my connection with the Citizen, terminated on the 26th inst., and also that all correspondence relative to the Reilly Testimonial, or other matters, may be addressed to me, at your office, 29 Ann-street, N. Y.

Yours faithfully. W. F. LYONS.

T. F. MEAGHER, Esq., Editor Irish News.

A distinguished correspondent writing to us from Columbus, Ohio, says:—"In the hot contest which I had in this District for Congress this fall—a contest unexampled for its fierceness and laboriousness—I found every mother's son (and daughter) of Ireland right at my side to the end. Not an Irishman failed us. By their united strength, I was enabled to change this District, which two years ago was 8330 against us, into 357 for us! Beating down the bigotry and zealotry of the political fanatics and preachers, and pulverising them into nothingness, by the cordial co-operation of the 'United Irishmen.' I wrote a lecture after the election, on "Irish Humor and its Peculiarities," have delivered it in your State, at Buffalo, Syracuse, Rochester, &c. to large audiences, who attended for the fun, but who got some wholesome and serious notions I hope, of English rule over Ireland. I do not know whether you have seen any notice of it; but the Celtic peculiarities in contrast with the pigheadedness of Saxondom, were shown up in an unexpected manner to those who came to hear about Irish bulls and brogue."

The following letter was read at the Banquet recently given to Michael Barry. It speaks for itself:—

BROOKLYN, Dec. 9th, 1856.

MY DEAR DOHENY:

I am truly sorry that it will be completely out of my power to attend the Banquet to be given to our friend, Michael Barry, on this evening. You will please to express my regret for my unavoidable absence, both to himself and to his and our friends.

As his comrade in the ranks of the Edward Fitzgerald Guard, and his associate in the deliberations of the "E. M. A." organization, I have had ample experience of his sterling honesty of purpose and his truthful devotion to the cause of Ireland's redemption. In that organization, which we once hoped to have made, and which may yet become the FORLORN HOPE of Ireland, there was not one who was found more unswerving in his courage and more constant at his post, whenever there was work to be done, than was he in whose honor you meet this night.

Trusting that his return to his native air, may restore him to health, and enable him still to labor on for the freedom of Ireland, and to aid the efforts of our brotherhood, I remain

In fraternity, your comrade,

JOHN O'MAHONY.

MICHAEL DOHENY, Esq.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1857.

THE NEW YEAR—A LOOK BEFORE AND BEHIND—ONE WORD FOR ONCE AND FOR ALL.

At the end of a journey, it is natural for one to look back, measure the distance he has come, and relate the incidents of the road. In this season—in this season of all others—when the fallen leaves lie deep beneath the snow, and the rivers check their speed—one feels a resistless impulse to talk of what is past. Every Household knows it. The World knows it.

With little to invite us back upon the path along which it has been our fate to travel, it is difficult, and might seem most ungracious, not to do so. Thorns, ruins, clouds repel us. Once escaped, brighter fortunes dissuade us from reverting to them. But, as there have been many treasures disentombed from graves, there are many wise lessons to be educed from sad experience.

And so we re-open the volume that has been clasped with iron, and make the chronicle of disasters a prophetic gospel of energy, faith, and hope.

A few months ago, we threw ourselves into the rough field of Journalism. They were the humbler duties of the profession we assumed. Excited by no events abroad, our tone was moderate. It was reserved. Many said it was tame. Deeply conscious of the responsibilities which one who instigated a people to a revolt for liberty incurs, we preferred the ignominy of being considered spiritless—recreant even—than encounter liabilities which a baffled enthusiasm incited by our words, a fruitless bloodshed and an accusing conscience would exact.

The Russian War, throughout this Continent, stimulated hopes and projects, which, rational and feasible as they seemed at first to those who earnestly and proudly thought of Ireland, faded into mere dreams and prayers—passed off into little better than vague sympathies and gossip—when the immediate interests of the European Royalties were considered, and the condition of the communities under them was with a frank sobriety discussed.

Russia was not in earnest in that war. Had she been so, she could have opened batteries on the English fleet—on swarms of flag-ships and gun-boats—from Howth and Dalkey. Her agents in this country had from authorized sources assurances of an immense support, had the tide of war been turned from the Crimean to the Irish coast. But Russia has Poland—a thoughtful, proud, irreconcilable captive—close beside her—watching every motion her imperious mistress makes—and Russia dares not venture far. She may sink her Navy in Sebastopol, and protest in thunders against the Western Powers. That's all. But that's enough for the memory of Catherine and the romance of Moscow.

France was not in earnest. That is, Louis Napoleon—the Highwayman of the Boulevards—was not in earnest, in that Russian War. He meant to go so far—just so far—but no farther. An Usurper, he had to consecrate his Usurpation. Triumphal arches reconcile the French to the bondage of a domiciliary police. With them, military success is a remission of sins the most execrable. They tolerate the Demon overshadowed by the resuscitated Eagles of the Empire. The tenantcy of the Tuilleries is legitimized by the capture of the Malakoff. Beyond this, the Assassin of St. Cloud dare not go. He dare not launch upon a great war. The first billow would engulph him. For he is no more the Emperor of France, than Francis Joseph is King of Hungary, or Ferdinand Bomba is rightful lord of Sicily. He may appease, and for a time intoxicate his slaves. He cannot afford to copy—cannot afford to emulate his portentous Uncle—in experiments of perilous magnificence. Without a Waterloo disaster—or the probability of any such transcendent catastrophe—he is chained to a rock from which there is no safe or triumphant flight. He dare not move an inch beyond his chain.

As for England, she never meant to go to war. Mustering at Woolwich and maneuvering at Spithead, she flattered herself that a little diplomacy in Constantinople and the planting of the St. George's Cross in the mud of Gallipoli would completely serve her purposes. She meant no war. She dreamt that Protocols would suffice. She believed in her Prestige. Providence otherwise disposed. Ignorantly and insensibly she slipped into that terrible carnage. Ruinously she bungled through it. Gladly she retreated from it. Nothing on this earth could tempt her to take a second plunge in that Avernian swamp of blood.

Openly and advisedly, England will undertake no European war—certainly no American war—whilst Ireland has her head above the sea. Well aware that Ireland was to her what Poland is to Russia—what the people of France is to Napoleon the Usurper—England did not meditate a war with Russia. Having become involved in one, she did not wish to prolong it. She could not afford to do so. Ireland, untameable and implacable under wrong, indignity, and a memory of a thousand years—which is to her a crown of thorns—was a chain upon her arm.

Knowing this, the Russian War brought to us no hope. Therefore, justified us in making none of those appeals which many of our gallant young countrymen awaited and implored. We confined ourselves simply and exclusively to the chronicling of whatever events and sayings concerned the Irish Race within this country, and abroad, and to this unpretentious, though useful, duty we restrict ourselves until other times and men have come.

FATHER MATTHEW.

The Theatre Royal, Dublin, never before presented a spectacle so impressive. People said so who had been present when George the Fourth appeared there. The banquet given to Lord Morpeth was eclipsed. The welcome which broke out in thunders, and flashed from thousands of exulting faces, the night that Tommy Moore received the myrtle wreath within those walls, was magnificently outdone. Even that, with all its glorious ecstasy, was excelled.

It was Thursday, the 26th of January, 1843. The hour was noon.

From pit to gallery, the great house was crowded. Hundreds upon hundreds had to leave. After twelve o'clock there was not a footing to be had. The upper and lower boxes formed one dense, broad, compact belt of living splendor. All that was most beautiful in a city famous for its beauty was gathered there. Neither King, nor Statesman, nor Poet had brought around him such a zone of radiant votaries. Nor had such a multitude, pouring out from the workshops, the marts, the colleges, the private mansions of the Metropolis, given so grand a voice and aspect to any similar ovation on a former day.

The stage was thronged. The most eminent noblemen of the country were there. Clergymen, noted for their piety and erudition, were there. Every creed was represented. Orators of surpassing power stood side by side with artists—painters, musicians, sculptors—whose fame was in the ascendant, if it had not reached the zenith. From the oldest and wealthiest estates, from the most distant parts of the island, came territorial lords, who, until this day, had never met the people in public audience but as antagonists. Now they met them in good faith, to show their enthusiasm and their gratitude. The Professions had their delegates in this incomparable assembly. The Army even—so reluctant to trust its crimson finery in a civilian crowd—had sent its deputation of Colonels, Aides-de-camps, and Captains on furlough.

In a word, the Irish nation sat in council there. For one supreme occasion, the tribes, the races, the provinces were in unity convoked. For one paramount duty, they had but one heart, one hand, one voice. Gratitude inspired them. It was a passion, which, in the contemplation and consciousness of a national benefit of eternal worth, had possessed the masses, seized on every household, fused a thousand conflicting memories, prejudices, schemes and interests, into one joyous and overpowering ecstasy, and one man was the worshipped object of it all.

"I assure you," said the Duke of Leinster, "it gives me the greatest pleasure to take the chair on this occasion, and in every way in my power evince the respect and esteem I entertain for the Very Rev. Theobald Matthew."

"Were it possible for me," said the Marquis of Headfort, as he moved the first resolution, "to pronounce an eulogium, most willingly and gladly should I do so; but, my Lord Duke, the merits of Father Matthew are beyond all praise, and the result of his labors beyond any reward the world can bestow."

Then an old and venerable man—three and seventy years of age—rose up. At the sight of his gray hairs, the people uncovered their heads, and with the gentleness of children listened to his words. The heavy hand of time pressed upon him sorely. He spoke in so low a tone, as to be scarcely audible at the reporter's table. So the papers said next morning. But feeble and inarticulate as he was, the great audience caught these words as they fell from the lips of the venerable Judge Moore, and they carried them away, dutifully and devoutly, as they would the last prayer and lesson of some good patriarch, stretching forth his hand above them from his death-bed—

"The example of Father Matthew did more for his country—his acts conferred more lasting good upon the people—than those of any patriot or statesman who ever lived. He had not only reformed the habits of Ireland, but laid seeds which would yet fructify and flourish in the improved state of the country and the future greatness of her people."

When the old man, having uttered these words, retired, the Marquis of Clanricarde spoke of the merits of Father Matthew being fully acknowledged by all parties and persons—spoke of the meeting being a union of gratitude and benevolence—spoke of the respect and docility with which the people had heard and obeyed the teachings of their beneficent apostle—and then gracefully gave way to Thomas Wyse, Smith O'Brien, and O'Connell.

With a purity of diction, and an elevation of thought, and a philosophy worthy of the theme, the occasion, and his own celebrity, Mr. Wyse dwelt upon the revolution of which Father Matthew had been the author:—

"Such a reformation or revolution is not the revolution of a day, nor the revolution of years—it does not confine itself to two or three thousand, or to a class or a sect, but begins with an individual and extends to an entire community—a revolution which lays the solid structure of a nation's greatness in the cultivation of moral habits, and the performance of religious duties. It is an easy thing to make a law. It is not difficult to place on the Statute-book prescriptions and remedies for the disorders of the country. Thousands upon thousands propose their nostrums for the removal of various evils. But let us have the man who performs good not by words but by deeds—let us have the man who shows himself the real true apostle of political economy—the man who regenerates and reforms, at the same time that he hopes and promises."

"They met," said Smith O'Brien, "not to pay the homage of triumph to a conqueror, who had deluged many a field with blood—they met not to pay homage to rank and station with the customary adulation—they met to testify their profound respect and thankfulness to an humble clergyman, who had eradicated a great national vice, and subdued it for ever."

O'Connell followed. Never was the voice of this wondrous orator so touching. Never were his words so musical and golden. Never was his fine presence so impressive. Never did the subtle intellect break out in such copious streams of glory from their source in that deep, massive brain. Never before did he so unquestionably seem to the beholders the inspired oracle of a spiritual, chivalrous, imaginative people.

"Yes," he exclaimed, "Father Matthew is an instrument in the hands of Providence. He is a meet instrument of the Almighty—an instrument of light and worth. Beams from Heaven mark and enlighten his career—blight and misery vanish wherever he appears. On such a subject I have not words to describe my thoughts. Words are nothing when such a topic comes before the mind. There is no painting the rainbow, the ray that comes from the Sun, the angelic wings that hover round the throne of God."

Two days after this vast assemblage had taken place, Thomas Davis wrote in the Nation these beautiful and most noble words:—

"Theobald Matthew's mission was to convince the People, through their reason and affections, of the virtue, and wisdom, and duty of Temperance; and he did his work. He did it thoroughly, nobly, purely, wonderfully. He came clothed in plain humility. His words were the native household speech of the People. He opened the cabin door, and showed the sober man how the wife and children of the drunkard withered to supply his debauch. He rolled on the changes of time. Rent unpaid, and land untilled, and deficient food, and sick bodies, and ruined affections, were seen in the train of excess. He pointed out to them the difficulty of amendment, and the impossibility of such impetuous minds as theirs compromising with vice, till they saw in his picture-words the drunkard hurrying to his fate as surely as the water, which has leaped the cliff, goes to break on the rocks at its base. And brighter visions came, too—comfort, for excess,—mirth, and music, and bold sports, for sottish indulgence—the pride of virtue, for the vaunt of vice. To have regenerated the People by such means, is the glory of him who taught, and of them who learned."

He in whose honor that vast multitude came together; whose praises were in the hearts and on the lips of those surging thousands; whose wondrous works were so extolled upon that memorable day; whose presence was eagerly sought for by the haughtiest notables of England; whose sweet influences fell like dew upon the rudest natures, and gave birth to flowers of divinest beauty where there had been the saddest wreck, and weeds, sterility and havoc; for whose footsteps the people of America listened with eagerness and love, and whose coming they hailed as no heroic guest was ever hailed before or since; he whose persuasion was to his own people as the miraculous touch which gave vision to the blind and life to those who had been dead, and whose fame was as the shining garments of the angel who announced the Resurrection to those who sought the sepulchre; in the centre of the beautiful grave-yard he had himself thrown open to the poor of every church, under the great stone Cross, this glorious good man—all that is mortal of him—sleeps. Beside that Cross—clinging to it in the agony of a breaking heart—kneels the Nation whose sorrow he consoled—whose cup of poison he changed to one of living waters—whose head he lifted up and crowned with lilies, when she had become a proverb of reproach among the Nations. As silent as the cities of Tyre and Edom shall Ireland have become, when in the shadow of that Cross, without the city of St. Finbar, the Irish heart forgets the noblest gentlest spirit that ever soothed it.

THE CIVILIZERS ON THE WALLS OF CHINA.

There is always something racy, spicy and enlivening at the annual dinner of the New-England Society in New-York. There is a flow of soul and a blending of social amenities which render those re-unions peculiarly pleasant. But on the stream of conviviality and eloquence, some puritanical conceit or Anglo-Saxon egotism is occasionally borne through the banquet-hall, and duly paraded in the columns of the press. At the recent New-England dinner, in the Astor House, Mr. Fillmore, who represented the London Times, indulged in a little Anglo-Saxon glorification, which gave proper zest to the proceedings of the evening. "You and ourselves," said he, "are the two branches of the great Anglo-Saxon race, and together, we are destined to be the civilizers of the world. Our courses are different. You go West—we move towards the East; and, as friends, we shall go onward, embracing the earth, until the two shall meet on the walls of China!" This promised pilgrimage to the walls of the Celestial Empire, was received with nine cheers for Old and New-England. This extensive tour of the two branches of the great Anglo-Saxon race is to be undertaken on purely philantropic grounds—Civilization is the word. England, of course, would neither import opium, nor calico, nor tax-collectors, nor the murderous policy of Clive and Warren Hastings. All her implements of torture and plans of spoliation and plunder wonld be left behind in the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay, or the recently civilized kingdom of Oude. This journey of civilization, however, is not likely to be soon accomplished by the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. Because there is no such thing as a great branch of the Anglo-Saxon race. It was crushed, pulverized and trodden into the earth by the mailed knights of Normandy, on the disastrous field of Hastings. What remained of it, has since been digging in the mines of England or ploughing up its soil; in fine, it has been chained as a drudge and vassal to the car of its Celtic rulers. The aristocracy of England are Celtic, and with the exception of Sir Robert Peel, there has not been a Saxon Premier in that kingdom since the Norman conquest. So many obstacles interpose between this meeting projected by Mr. Fillmore, of the Times, that it is idle to seriously discuss it. The power of Russia has to be overcome before she can advance her red flag one inch towards the wall of China, or any other wall, and the present difficulty with Persia must be favorably arranged before even her Eastern possessions are secure. America may extend the bounds of civilization, advance her ennobling institutions, and press forward in the march of freedom until the whole earth is encircled in an eternal bond of Republican brotherhood; but England must halt. Limits have been already set to her ambition, and as a French paper has recently observed, her visor has been lifted, and the pedlar who has been wandering about the world, disguised as a knight, has been exposeed. But while Mr. Fillmore utters these stale platitudes, his journal abuses America as a Fillibustering nation, whose "aggressions" England and France are bound to resist.

England seems more intent upon extending her possessions in the West than in the East. American progress on this continent is jealously watched by the English government, and the motives of our people persistently misrepresented by the English press. Whenever any object is to be achieved or any cheat imposed upon the world, the representatives of England lose no opportunity, however small, to parade British magnanimity, and gain over, as allies, people whom they hate and fear as rivals. America repudiates such cant. She stands in no need of European aid, sympathy or assistance for propagating her ideas, advancing the standard of Republican civilization, or extending her dominions Westward. Long after the English flag shall have gone down, never to rise again, this Republic, composed of men of all nations, all races and creeds—of men standing upon the broad platform of human rights and in the equal enjoyment of the same constitutional privileges—even when the Plymouth Rock shall have crumbled into the ocean—this Republic then, as now, will be the great bulwark of human freedom, the home of the oppressed of every land, proudly declining to court the friendship of any despotism, haughtily refusing to succumb to its dictation, and scorning to be its accomplice in any schemes designed to bolster up its finances or prestige.

CAPTAIN HUSTON.

A requisition, addressed to this excellent officer, appea s in our columns. It has been signed by a number of the be.t men in the city. The names of the Captains of some of the oldest Companies of the First Division are attached to it. A crowd of the younger officers follow them. Nor is it all left with the bold soldier boys. Hundreds of civilians—gentlemen of solid worth and influence—unite with his military friends in tendering to Captain Huston this testimony of their respect, friendship and warm good wishes. In compliance with the request they have made, Captain Huston lectures in Hope Chapel, on the 12th of January. The subject he has chosen is truly seasonable in these times, when the vicious bigotry of the Old World, imported hither by the brazen trumpeters of Bedlamite conventicles, and multiplied ad infinitum by a swarm of diminutive lay-pontiffs and pedlars in counterfeit religion, has given rise to a black conspiracy against the rights of conscience, and produces, as in Baltimore lately, riotousness and bloodshed. Coming, as he does, from the North of Ireland—for years the stronghold of Orangeism, and the scene of many a butcherly onslaught instigated by bigots—Captain Huston will bring to the elucidation of his subject the experience of an observing, thoughtful and retentive mind. We sincerely trust to see Hope Chapel filled to overflowing on so useful, creditable and instructive an occasion.

THE IRISH STAGE—JOHN BROUGHAM AND THE BOWERY.

At the first dinner of the Eighty-Two Club in, the Pillar Room of the Dublin Rotunda, Mr. Dillon Browne, the Member for Mayo, speaking to the toast—The Dramatists of Ireland—mentioned in a sprightly way quite a number of quaint and curious facts. The first regular theatre established in Dublin was in Werburgh street, in the reign of Charles the First. Previous to this—in the reign of Henry the Eighth—plays had been performed in a peripatetic booth—in a theatre which folded up like an umbrella, and was transported hither and thither on wheels. The theatre in Werburgh street was erected by Mr. John Ogilby, Master of the Revels, during the Vice-royalty of the Earl of Stafford. John Ogilby was an enterprising man. He had hardly opened the play-house in Werburgh street, when he rang the bell for the curtain to rise in another Temple of the Dramatic Muse, in the odoriferous region of Smock-alley. Smock-alley was the scene of exuberant festivities for nights after the Williamite victory of the Boyne had been gazetted. An amateur company—Orange to the back-bone—took possession of the stage and green-room, issued invitations—free tickets, in plain words—and gratuitously murdered Othello. In 1695, George Farquhar cleansed Smock-alley from the smell of Orange peel, and in the character of Sir Henry Wilder has left a memory pious, glorious, and immortal, which should span the Boyne, with a glittering arch of peace. After Farquhar came Booth, and then a long procesion of celebrities—Quin, Cibber, Garrick—and after them, Barry, Messop, Woodward and Woffington—until Crow street snatched the masque and buskin from Smock-alley, and Smock-alley became religious.

These, and memories of a less ancient date, at this season play down upon us—in through this dusty window on our right, like colored sunbeams—and the narrow cell-like Sanctum we ply the pen and scissors from morn to twilight in, fills up with a gay and gorgeous crowd. All its raggedness, flimsiness of furniture, lean poverty of carpeting, its hideous heaps of dissected newspapers, black-crusted inkstands, confiscated manuscripts, broken-nosed goose-quills, and all the deformities and horrors of our dusky dungeon vanish. In the dawning light of the Youthful Year it expands and glitters. All about us are pedestals, chandeliers, and Caducci of burnished gold. All about us are mouldings and frescoes fashioned from the calcined vestiges of Herculaneum and Pompeii. All about us are wreaths of lilac, acanthus, and the laurel of the Vale of Tempe. And into the midst of all this dazzling drapery, coloring, and sculpture—in the midst of music, huzzas, and showers of olive leaves and shamrock—comes Sheridan, leading Lady Teazle—comes Brooks, introducing the Constant Couple—comes Congreve, claiming a favorable verdict for his Double-Dealer—comes Goldsmith, in his plum-colored suit, the very image of his Good-Natured Man, shoving Tony Lumpkin before the world—comes Maturin, slip-shod and cowering in the shadow of Bertram—come Shiel and Banim, hand-in-hand, beckoning Damon and Pythias to renew the epic story of their truth and love—comes Griffin, conducting with the tread and majesty of an Archon from the Academic groves, Gysippus, the Athenian model of his own goodness, adversity, and genius—comes, at last, John Brougham—genial, bountiful, exhaustless—with a heart that never fails and a wit that never flags—with a full chorus of his own bright, kindly, rollicking, reckless, tearful, tender, gallant, loving and loveable progeny tumbling at his heels—waving aloft the wand of Sheridan—

"Who ruled like a wizard the world of the heart,
And could call up its sunshine or bring down its showers,
Whose eloquence—brightening whatever it tried,
Whether reason or fancy, the gay or the grave—
Was as rapid, as deep, and as brilliant a tide,
As ever bore Freedom aloft on its wave."

A call-boy enters. A messenger from Watters—the Typeking of the Irish News—by the twin souls of Faust and Guttenberg!

"More copy, Sir."

The enchantment is at an end. Of all we have dreamt, nothing remains but the grand old Bowery—the People's Temple of the Drama—and our friend, John Brougham, with his Games of Life and Love!

THE MILITARY RESOURCES OF IRELAND.

We reproduce to-day the first portion of a remarkable pamphlet just published in Dublin. It treats of the military resources of the country, armament, organization, and successful mode of warfare of which it is capable. This essay, published and circulated in Ireland, where to drill, train or teach men the use of arms has been made a felony by the British Parliament, is peculiarly significant in the present unsettled state of Europe. The author treats his subject in a clear and simple manner, demonstrating to minds of ordinary capacity how the battle of freedom may be fought and won in the old land. From the geographical position and physical conformation of Ireland, intersected by rivers, dotted by lakes, ribbed and girdled by mountains, and presenting a continuous surface of hill and valley: there is not a country in the world better adopted for defensive warfare. There are passes in Connemara and in the Commeraghs where freedom may yet send for thher ringing, defiant rallying shout, and consecrate a future Thermopylæ. We shall continue in our future numbers the publication of this essay; and we earnestly direct to it the attention of the Irish military companies, to whom it cannot fail to be deeply interesting and instructive.

What holier or nobler charity than to assist and provide for the poor and destitute children? For that purpose, a course of lectures are about being delivered at Hope Chapel, Broadway. Four most eminent Lecturers are engaged. We trust the course will be attended by crowds. The Committee's advertisement appears elsewhere in our paper.

We learn that in compliance with the request of numerous friends of Nicaragua in this city, Col. J. W. Fabens, who has for some time past been at the head of the Colonization Department of that Republic, will give a lecture in the Broadway Tabernacle, on Monday evening next, to commence at half past 7 o'clock.

The lecture will treat of the climate, soil and productions of Nicaragua, setting forth the many advantages which it offers to the European and American colonist—topics upon which the Colonel's long residence in the country will enable him to speak with accuracy and confidence.

Lecture on the Life and Character of the Late Devin Reilly.

John Mitchel delivered a lecture on the above subject, at the Tabernacle, on Monday evening. It was a brilliant and vigorous effort—a fitting garland to plant on the grave of his gallant young friend, who had dared and suffered so much in the noble cause, which, thank God! still lives, although many of its brave defenders have sunk into distant and unknown graves. The house was not so full as we expected it should have been upon such an occasion.

Our Irish citizens did not rally to that work of charity and patriotism in such numbers as the genius dedicated by Devin Reilly and the heroic devotion of John Mitchel to the liberation of Ireland demanded. Every seat and corner in the building should have been filled. It is truly disgraceful that such was not the case. The lecture will be immediately published by Mr. P. M. Haverty, of Fulton street, for the benefit of the widow and child of our glorious gifted friend.

No Irishman—no Democrat—no Republican—should be without a copy of it. John Mitchel's noble oration on the Dead would have immortalized him, if his own genius and chivalry had not done so.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

ANOTHER CHAPTER ABOUT PAT COSTELLO, THE KILKENNY ATTORNEY.

The eloquence of this patriotic gentleman could not be said to have been very copious. Indeed, it would be difficult to say he was gifted with any. He himself never professed to do more than offer a few observations on the question before him, whatever that was. This was his permanent exordium. Nor was it a rhetorical deception. Whenever he spoke, the approprianess was not less remarkable than the conciseness of his speech. He never failed to speak to the point. His narrative was exact. Intelligible to the dullest comprehension, it invariably steered clear of poetry on the one hand, and philosophy on the other. The same may be said of his argument. It always stuck to the point. Logicians might have considered it in many instances fallacious, but it was upon all occasions satisfactory to those who concurred with him in political opinion. What more was required?

Somewhat deficient in pathos, his invective was forcible. No effeminate elegancies of diction neutralized its vigor. What it wanted in polish, it made up for in sinew. His irony was keen. His wit was supreme. In comparison with it, all his other accomplishments were of little or no account. It was this which won him the popularity he enjoyed. It was this which captivated the courtier and endeared him to the demagogue. It was this which secured him the handsome emolument he draws quarterly from the Treasury in London. It is this which will perpetuate his memory in the convivial gossip and polite literature of Ireland, for many years to come.

Mr. Costello, every summer since the passing of the Emancipation Act, had been in the habit of making a tour through Europe. He carried his gold-headed cane and jaunty white hat with him wherever he went. It was not long before they became as familiar to the fashionable frequenters of the Allée Verte of Brussels, and Grosse Garten of Dresden, as they were to the jarvies of Dublin or the bathing-men of Tramore. With all his good humor, he had his personal dislikes. They were decidedly strong and deep-rooted. Nothing could soften them. Nothing could change them. A brother attorney, named Johnson, was an Orangeman—lived in Castlecomer—had often met Pat on the other side of an ejectment-case at Quarter Sessions, and had as often beaten his rival with costs. The political reasons for Mr. Costello's antipathy to Johnson were strengthened by professional experiences. The antipathy grew to be notorious. Every attorney in Kilkenny, County and City, knew of it. Every member of the Leinster Bar knew of it. Nicholas Purcell O'Gorman, Chairman of the Kilkenny Quarter Sessions, was well aware of it. He referred to it at times impressively in his judicial decisions. Many of the Judges were informed of the fact. Torrens, Penefather, Dogherty were conscious of it. The only allusion they made to it, however, was conveyed through a smile.

Mr. Costello was a member of the Reform Club, Dawson street, Dublin. Of this Club, Sir Timothy O'Brien, John Hyacinth Talbot, John Reynolds, Sir John Power, the distiller of John's lane, were pillars of light. Eight or ten years ago, Mr. Costello returned from a trip up the Rhine. He had been to the Mineral Springs of Aix. In the Bain de la Reine d'Hongerie, he had steeped his wearied limbs. Doing nothing in Dublinbut swinging his gold-headed cane and cocking his jaunty white hat—all on the strength of his quarterly instalments from the Treasury in London—he was on the eve of paralysis. The baths of Aix-la-Chapelle were his only resource. He had steamed up serenely under the Drachnefels, and had felt his withered soul expand. In Coblentz he had seen the gigantic face of the clock of the Hotel de Ville open and shut its carnivorous mouth, as the Hours went down it. Up the steep slopes and winding avenues of Ehrenbreistein—avenues winding as the stairs in a Light-house—he had puffed and blown until he had reached the broad esplanade, crowned with its thousand guns of ponderous metal, rom which the heights of Pfuffendorf and the gentle waters of the Moselle are visible.

"So, Pat," they said, as Mr. Costello sauntered into the coffee-room of the Club in Dawson street, with his white hat and gold-knobbed cane, the morning he landed in Kingston, on his return from this trip on the Continent, "So, Pat, you've been up the Rhine with Johnson."

"I, up the Rhine with Johnson!"

The Coffee-room was silent. Alderman Keeshan, breakfasting at the further end of it, stopped cracking his egg, and looked up. Dr. Gray, of the Freeman, reading the Saunders over his chops, put down the paper and listened. John Hyacinth Talbot, with his back to the chimney-piece, brushed back his voluminous white hair, pulled down his blue cashmere waistcoat, and, whispering with a mouthful of humor to Sir Thomas Esmonde, who all the time kept twinkling and trifling, said—

"Be my faith, Pat's up for something."

"I, up the Rhine with Johnson," says Pat.

He threw down his hat on the table before him—hit the hearth-rug with the brass end of his stick—threw himself back—just as if he were going to offer a few observations just to the point—and licking his lips, as if to let the answer out easy, turned to Sir Timothy O'Brien, Nick Maher, of Turtulla, Pierce Mahony, and a group of other quizzical genial old fellows, whispering in the sweetest of oleaginous tones—

"I, up the Rhine with Johnson!—bedad I wouldn't go down the Dodder with him."

That was enough. More than enough. On the spot, Pat was invited to meet the whole company at dinner the next evening, at five; and the Dodder and the Rhine were, till long past midnight, the streams on which, like Venetian gondolas or Cleopatra state-barges, the most sparkling anecdotes, songs the most rollicking or touching, sentiments the most patriotic and chivalrous, dashed along into the roseate harbor of the morning, when all was still.

Three years after this—in the summer of 1846—I met my friend, Mr. Costello, leisurely and complacently moving up the Mall, in the city of Waterford. He had just come down from Dublin. Had just arrived on Bianconi's car from Kilkenny. Was on his way to Tramore. For, next to the springs of Harrowgate or the baths of Dobberan, he relished the easy dips he could take on the velvet strand, stretching away between the Rabbit burrow and the cliffs which lead to the Ladies' cove. Tramore was his favorite resort the summers he shifted his sail from the Rhine. It was just after the Secession of Young Ireland from the Repeal Association. Mr. Costello was a thorough O'Connellite. He followed him. He worshipped him. So he said. So, with his stick and hat, bringing both into emphatic play, he made an affidavit. The recent event was canvassed. I said little. Pat said much. It was impossible to put in an oar, so rapid and exuberant was the current of his antagonism.

"I tell you what, Meagher."

"What?" I replied.

"You're not a bad fellow," says he.

"That's fair enough," says I.

"But," says he.

"Well," says I.

"You're hard to deal with."

"Glad to hear so."

"I tell you what," says Pat, and he pulled himself straight up opposite the Mayor's office, with his back to the black railings running along the basement of the Town-hall, "I tell you what, that Smith O'Brien and ould Richard O'Gorman are the best of men."

"No better," says I.

"But," says he.

"But what?" says I.

"Well, they are the best of men, you know."

"You said that before."

"True enough," says he.

"Well now, it comes to this"—and with this, Mr. Costello, as usual, brought his inseparable gold-headed cane to bear on the point; and with a wink, a leer, and a luscious smack of his lips, turns to me confidentially and whispers—"it comes to this, Meagher, that Smith O'Brien and ould Richard O'Gorman are the best gentlemen we have—but they're crotchety, you know—crotchety, you know—they never give in."

"Never—that's true," I abruptly observed.

"Never give in," he resumed.

Costello paused for a moment, looked knowingly at me, winked, jerked his white hat on one side, flung out his famous gold-headed stick from his wrist towards the lamp-post right opposite him, and with his former confidential intonation continued—

"I tell you what, that good as they are, honest as they are, the best of living men though they be, so crotchety are they—crotchety is the word, Meagher—crotchety, you know—so damn crochety are they—so honest I mane—they wouldn't be—neither Smith O'Brien nor ould Richard O'Gorman—they wouldn't be a fortnight in Heaven, before they'd kick up another Paradise Lost."

Pat Costello, after all, was a good fellow. He wished well to the most of mankind. He, certainly, wished well to those whose political opinions were the shadow or the substance of his own, or in any way, by forced construction or incidental confusion of events and personages, approximated with those he found it his interest, or felt it his duty, to express. Had his necessities been greater, he would have been a Falstaff—an attenuated, but yet a jovial Falstaff—and his sympathies and witticisms, quickened by poverty, might have been larger, brighter, more profuse and elevated. As things were, he was, as I have said, a good old soul, and with his sayings and doings I have yet another column or two to fill.

A NEW YEAR'S GARLAND.

Our brilliant and witty contributors seem to have caught inspiration from the hopes, joys and sociability of the festive season.

On commencing the struggle with the New Year, the exhortation of M. O'Keeffe is well worthy of attentive perusal. Its teaching is wholesome, and our readers must not think it unsuited to "ripe middle age" because the author calls it—

A SONG FOR THE YOUNG.

WRITTEN FOR M. E. D.

Think of the future, and try to recover
Some gains that will pay for the loss of the past;
The mind when 'tis willing, must surely discover,
Material to feed its desires to the last.
Oh! work with new vigor, and never let sorrow
Drop into your bosom for crosses gone by;
Make much of to-day and much more of the morrow,
And guard against rain when the weather is dry.

Think of the future and make it your study,
To improve all the moments that come in your way;
The heart moved by action ennobled, is ready
To forward its mission and scorns delay.
The smallest may bloom with a little ability;
For wonders oft spring from the humble and low,
And honest exertion gives strength and stability
To the hopes that are fresh on industry's brow.

Think of the future, and make it the highest
And proudest ambition that swells in your breast;
Do not be o'erbalanced, stray-hearted, or biased—
Aside when your object is planned for the best.
To gloom with the cloud, or to roar with the storm,
Becomes not the spirit which energy steers;
There is nothing like keeping that poised uniform
Which tempers the mind amid sunshine and tears.

Think of the future—you have power in your arm;
You have health, you have strength—what more do you need?
And whether at the anvil, the desk or the farm,
Cheer on—for through God and yourself you'll succeed.
Cheer on for your country—be a native or stranger;
No matter what region gives true merit birth,
Honest industry will never endanger
Our stronghold of freedom—Columbia's earth.

M. O'KEEFFE.

Having fully made up one's mind to follow out or up this good advice—to "think of the future," "cheer on for our country," and look out for a rainy day, we feel relieved. The pleasures of the season crush out the meditations which will intrude even into the gayest clatter and the most jocund adaptation to the usages to which the young year is heir. As "Shamrock" sings, the reign of comedy commences. But listen to Thalia, reviewing her eight sisters and—with the aid and countenance of the witty Williams—giving an account of herself—

THE MUSES—THALIA.

Why, surely, Sisters, you have lost your senses:
At last the reign of Comedy commences
Among the Muses, from this merry moment;
Altho' no doubt, by you it was not so meant.
Who cares a Spartan letter for your splutter?
You only prove my reign, the more you utter.
Think of Uravia rambling thro' the firmament,
By moonlight too—which, surely, never her 'Ma meant.
And then, her starriness prepared to quarrel
About a shabby, scraggy sprig of laurel!
Melpomene, despite her high pretensions,
With obvious crustiness her juggling mentions.
She knows right well that tears to fill the Tiber
Like one clear laugh brace not the spirit's fibre.
Give me the silver murmurs of Illyssus,
Whose echoes taught me music such as this is.
There brave Calliope, whose mimic thunder
Might split old hickory at once asunder,
Abandons pulpit, rostrum, stump and forum;
Nay, in her fury, almost cuts decorum,
And, for some whithered, sapless, crumbling branches
A world of fustian at her sisters launches!
Then boasts Polymnia of her lyric splendor,
And sighs Erato, green as she is tender.
Sweet lyres! I grieve the former and the latter
Should jar their frames for such a trifling matter.
Clio, because dry chronicles she scratches,
Thinks that each Muse she easily o'ermatches,
Tho' men scarce read the telegraph despatches.
Euterpe thumps and hammers grand pianos—
The direst plagues that half-distracted man knows.
The queen of fiddlers and of ball-room tapers,
Terpsichore excels in cutting capers.
Spin, bound, chassee, hop, pigeon-wing and wriggle,
And all is flutter, chatter, fuss and giggle!
Nice reasons are they not? upon my honor,
Why the Muse-wreath should be conferred upon her!
We all, except myself, have little better.
Excuse my candor—each to me is debtor.
What have you all achieved, or can hereafter,
Unless I give you health and joy and laughter?
These are from Jove, on high Olympus dwelling—
In joy alone the Gods are all-excelling.
And as for men, our half-celestial neighbors,
Have they not real agonies and labors,
And passions countless, without your assistance
To multiply them, thro' all time and distance?
Be wise and just by truthfully confessing
That I to all am Heaven's divinest blessing.
Back to his native night I banish sadness,
And breath around health, innocence and gladness!
I was the only one with man that sported,
Before you all his earthly passions courted.
Not on benevolence your thrones are builded,
But tears and blood cement them howe'er gilded,
Except perhaps Urania's, yet her fictions
Puff up, depress, or lead to false predictions.
Trine, square and sextile! these the least absurd of it;
But man can live and die without a word of it.
For many a cause I justly rank before you;
But I shall not by longer prosing bore you.
Confirm my right—so dance your pulses merry!
Refuse, and you shall soon be sorry, very.
Left to yourselves, I'll dwell in Heaven hereafter,
And make, from starry floor to beamy rafter,
Olympus ring to Jove's unwonted laughter!
But, sisters, since ye all are rivals, follow:
Let's lay the case before the just Apollo.

SHAMROCK.

And while "Heaven's divinest blessing" and she is that—is laying the case before Apollo, let us hail, all hail the new and best poet of the Oyster—aye, greater than Kit North, Tim Tickler, or even the immortal Ensign O'Doherty, himself. Show us in the Notes Ambrosianæ no Oyster song as good as this. It transports us to the glorious coast scenery on the Clare side of Galway Bay, where, as "Garryowen," in all his glory, tells us—"The sea is a churn that works into butter the Black-fins of Burran." It is really a delicious lyric. It makes one smack his lips; it tingles the tongue and destroys one's peace of mind for a week. Read it friend—read it, and if you don't contract with the Ocean Telegraph Company to send you "quicker nor lightning" to the West of Ireland, that you may rival Neptune on the Red Bank under the shadow of "Black Head," then you have not the taste you ought to have, nor the palate we gave you credit for:

THE BLACKFINS OF BURRAN.

(Air—Oh think not my spirits are always so light.)

The Princes Bay oysters are gems of the sea,
And the Morris Cove plants are delicious to me;
But none have I found in my foreign sojourn
To equal the plump little Blackfins of Burran.
The oysters of England—my curse on the crew—
Are as big and as tough as the sole of your shoe,
They taste of green halfpence and give one a turn,
That makes him then sigh for the Blackfins of Burran.
The oysters of Burran, the Blackfins of Burran,
Till I am in ashes and cold in my urn,
I nee'r shall forget then, wherever I turn,
The cream of the ocean—the Blackfins of Burran.
They are exquisite always, but chiefly excel,
In their own native beauty and brine on the shell,
With a trifle of lemon-juice no one need spurn,
To tickle his gums with the Blackfins of Burran.
I've read in Munchausen, where Holland gin grew,
With accounts for the milk in the cocoanut too,
But I know of myself where the sea is a churn,
That works into butter the Blackfins of Burran.
Stout succulent shellfish, how often I long
To meet you once more, amid wine, mirth, and song,
For Swift, Moore, and Sheridan, Canning and Curran,
Caught the salt of their wit from the Blackfins of Burran.
The pearl of great price that Marc Antony drank
In his punch, Cleopatra had brought from Red Bank,
Where Neptune, the thief, used with Venus adjourn,
To kindle new love on the Blackfins of Burran.
And don't you remember how often you strayed,
On the green sod of Erin with some little maid,
Who told you with eyes of the roguishest turn,
That your lips had a smack of—the Blackfins of Burran.
The Princes Bay oysters are gems of the sea,
And the Morris Cove plants are delicious to me;
But I ne'er will be easy until I return,
And smother with kisses the Blackfins of Burran.
The Blackfins of Burran, sweet oysters of Burran,
Till I am in ashes and cold in my urn,
I ne'er will forget then, wherever I turn,
The cream of creation—the Blackfins of Burran.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Darley's Margaret; Estelle Anna Lewis' Records of the Heart and other Poems; Irving's Life of Washington; Headley's Life of Washington; Kirker's publications—Catholic History, St. John's Manual; Haverty's importations—University Magazine, Celtic Union Works, &c. Boston booksellers—Donahoe and Hickey—O'Brien's Meditations in Exile, Life of Mary Queen of of Scots, Mr. Hickey's stock, &c.

Without exception, Felix O. C. Darley's outline illustrations to Judd's New England novel Margaret, are the most creditable specimens of American Art yet published. The work is one which it is a national duty to sustain. Every man presuming to taste and culture ought to feel proud that he has the opportunity of placing such a work on his library table. Moritz Retzsch, by his illustrations of Shakspere, Goethe and Schiller, has made a reputation not confined alone to Germany or even to Europe. His works are highly prized here and find purchasers among those people who behold in Art the chiefest index to the growth of actual civilization. Darley's Margaret, not only will compare favorably with the best outlines of Retzsch, but we think he is free from the hardness of contour which occasionally breaks the more harmonious feeling of the great German's figures. It would be ungenerous in us, who have derived so much gratification and instruction from the works of the latter, to introduce into a paragraph any casual hypercriticism. It is not our desire to do it. Nor could we, on the other hand, do justice to Darley by any such course of critical inquiry. Suffice it, that the very fact of such a comparison being suggested to us, is the best proof, to our mind, that Mr. Darley is an artist in the front rank with one who previously had no compeer. This is the best recommendation we can offer, in lieu of more lengthy remarks on this glorious work. We see it stated in the Daily Times that the plates of some of the most elegantly illustrated books ever published in America were executed in Europe. The plates, it says, of the Republican Court, published by the Appletons, were engraved and printed in London, from original pictures sent from here, while the plates in the Court of Napoleon, published by Derby & Jackson, were engraved, printed and colored in Paris. The best illustrated editions of Longfellow have been printed in London, although they have been issued with the names of his Boston publishers. Audubon was compelled to have the plates of his great work on American Ornithology executed in Paris, but Downing could find no one in Paris to color the plates of his large work on American Fruits, and at last succeeded in finding the right talent in Buffalo.

In view of these facts, it is gratifying to learn that the plates of Margaret were engraved in this city. It matters little if Konrad Hüber is an European, when we know that citizenship of the Republic makes the man who holds it an American. It is a compliment to the public taste when men eminent in art, letters and science make America their home. The thirty illustrations "conveying" Margaret, are the fruit of eleven years of loving devotion and study on the part of the artist. Almost every phase of New England country life is touched, with a grace, fervor, versatility and truth, that exhibit the careful elaboration and concentrated force bestowed upon the respective individualities of the series. It is published by Redfield, Beekman street, who has issued, in various bindings, many books—including several by popular Irish authors—for the holidays.

It is not every day that a poet lives to see her various works collected into such a splendid volume as that just issued by the Appletons. We allude to the Records of the Heart, and other Poems. By Estelle Anna Lewis. It is no slight indication of the popularity of a writer, to say the least, that the waifs and strays, as well as the more ambitious efforts of his pen, take sufficient hold on the popular mind of his country, to guarantee their collection. Publishers are timid, and indeed authors who value reputation generally not less so, with regard to such wholesale aspiration for reputation and profit. Happy must the writer be, and thrice happy the publisher of such productions, which safely recommend themselves to the present and posterity.

The poems of Estelle Anna Lewis have always demanded and received that full appreciation from the most intellectual of even her rivals, which is only accorded when the claim is backed by great force, bright brain, and the elegant and substantial acquirement of scholastic resource. Mrs. Lewis possesses these requirements, and consequently has wooed the Muses with eclat and—that greater solace than popular applause—the appreciation of the poets. Edgar A. Poe, than whom the age has not seen a more æsthetic, ast ute and merciless critic, and whose slightest sentence of commendation or censure of his contemporaries, is eagerly approved by many critics, not only in America, but in England, and more lately in France—he has written that the lady, whose collected works we now en passant notice, was in the front rank of the female writers of this age and country. As we intend to review the poems more at length hereafter, we will only say that Poe's acute brain was not biassed in this judgment, and pass on to a recommendation of the work as a most suitable gift-book for those days of hearty good-nature, and the interchange of friendly and useful souvenirs. Mrs. Lewis's poems are exquisitely gotten up. Beautiful paper, clear type and elegant binding combine to render the externals unexceptionable. In addition, we are presented with several illustrations, (executed in America) from some of our most poetic, graphic and well known artists. Thus we have a bijou of pictures transferred on paper, from the pencils of Maclise, Huntington, Addison Richards, Cheney and others, engraved by the last named artist, Halpin, and O'Neill (he of the Emmet portraits in Haverty's edition of the Lives and Times of the Emmets.) A fine portrait of "Estelle" herself from a picture by Elliot, fronts the title page, from beholding which one will not wonder at the rare poetic feast behind it. It is published by the Appletons.

A Life of Washington is a book that ought to be found on the table of every citizen of the Republic. We especially recommend such a work to the perusal of our adopted citizens. The facts, the aims, the deeds of that great and pure man's career cannot be too often or too earnestly scanned by our fellow-countrymen. In it they will learn fully to appreciate the blessings they enjoy and the thorough senselessness and stupidity of those who would deny to them the franchise guaranteed by the Constitution, and the actual necessities under which that Constitution was framed. Washington Irving's life of the "Father of his Country," must, of course, be on the shelves of all those who can afford to purchase such a work, written by such a man. It is to be, and will be the monumental literary tribute of the first author to the first citizen of these United States. To speak of it is only to make an opportunity to write a paragraph. At this day when the name of Washington Irving is only less known than that of George Washington, it is almost superfluous to say that every one knows that such a work is to be had everywhere, and that all who could should buy it.

Next to that work there is one to which we charitably desire to draw attention. We say charitably, because we feel that we extend a boundless charity to one who would extend no charity to us, if we desired it, which, let us say in a political or any other sense, we do not. We allude to the Life of Washington, written by Joel T. Headley, our present Secretary of State, to which political position he was carried by a junction with the now effete, squashed, disabled, limping and senseless party the Know-Nothings. While we heartily and thoroughly commend Mr. Headley's admirable book, we pity any man who at the sacrifice of all manly principles rushes from the reputation he made as an author into the notoriety to be made as a politician. But we are not writing a political article. It is not our province. The Life of George Washington implores us to forget the partialities of a man in the remembrance that he is a man; and we happily forget the author of Washington's Life, reviewing the bright pages devoted to a history of that great man's career. Well, then, the book is a most readable and useful one, not entering into details too minutely, and yet not passing over anything necessary to be told. The style of the book is seductive, and is, to our mind, an improvement on the too redundant pages of Mr. Headley's former works. In saying this, we do not desire to be classed with those who condemn by wholesale our author's manner. It is true that he, in general, makes the most of any subject he takes in hand, but really this in his case is a recommendation. If, occasionally, his figures are too florid, and colored, mayhap, hastily, we must not forget the vivacity with which his facts are related, and the picturesqueness of his landscapes and battle-scenes. The author thinks it necessary to state that—lest he might be thought as entering the field against Washington Irving—his life was published serially, which we remember, in Graham's Magazine, before the other was announced. The Documents of some leading participators in the revolution were furnished to Mr. Headley while engaged on his work; and we can recommend it as a very valuable acquisition to such of our friends' libraries as may not be furnished with a life of the "General." It is furnished with a fine likeness of Washington, and forty engravings on steel and wood, is handsomely printed and bound, and makes a serviceable and elegant gift-book. Published by Scribner.

For our Catholic friends, Mr. James Kirker, (Dunigan & Brother,) has provided a suitable assortment of necessary religious publications. At such a season as the present their value as gifts receive a tender and lasting impressiveness. Good at all times for those professing the Catholic Faith, they are peculiarly adapted to the present, when love, sociability and friendship, inspired by the religious feelings, and made holy and happy for all time by the truths of which the anniversary is so brightly suggestive. We perceive that a Second Edition of the "Catholic Church in the United States" has been issued. For those who can discern where history should end and temporary politics begin, the book will be useful. There are many facts in it, but the manner in which they are put together is distinctive more of a rabid journalist than a clear-headed and impartial historian. Many persons will overlook this defect, consoling themselves with the facts in whatever shape they receive them. We will review the work more at length. A very prominent publication of Mr. Kirker's is "St. John's Manual." It is a Prayer Book, and Guide to the Public Worship and Services of the Catholic Church in the United States, with a collection of Devotional Exercises for private use. It professes to be, and with the sanction of the Catholic authorities, is, the best compilation from the Prayer Books, Office Books, Rituals, &c., known. A slight outline of its contents will be more satisfactory to those who need such a work than any lay recommendation. It contains sections devoted to a—

Calendar, Moveable Feasts, &c.; Summary of Christian Doctrine; Morning Exercise and Prayers; Evening Exercise and Prayers; Family Prayers for Morning and Evening; Morning and Evening Prayers for every day in the week; Instructions on the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass; the Ordinary of the Mass, with full explanations; Devotions for Mass, by way of Meditation on the Passion; Mass, in Union with the Sacred Heart of Jesus; Prayers for the Dead; Method of Hearing Mass spiritually, for those who cannot attend actually; Collects, Epistles and Gospels for all the Sundays and Holidays, including the Ceremonies of Holy week, with Explanations of the Festivals and Seasons; Vespers, with full explanation; the Office of Tenebræ; on the Sacrament of Penance; Preparation and Prayers before Confession; Instructions and Devotions for Holy Communion; Instruction and Devotions for Confirmation; General Devotions; Devotions to the Holy Trinity, to the Holy Ghost, to the Sacred Humanity of our Lord, the Holy Name, the Infant Jesus, the Passion, the Holy Eucharist, the Sacred Heart, to the Blessed Virgin, to the Holy Angels, to the Saints, for particular seasons and circumstances, for the Pope, the Church, the Authorities, the Conversion of those in error; Prayers for various states of life, for Children, the Married, the Single, &c.; Instructions on Matrimony and the Marriage Service, Churching of Women; Instruction and Order of Baptism, &c., &c.; Devotions for the Use of the Sick; the Office of the Dead; the Burial Service; Manner of receiving Profession from a Convert. We have also Litanies of the Saints; of Faith, Hope, Charity, Penance, and Thanksgiving, by Pope Pius VI.; of the Most Holy Trinity; Infant Jesus; Life of Christ; Passion; Cross, Blessed Sacrament, Sacred Heart of Jesus, Sacred Heart of Mary, Immaculate Conception, Holy name of Mary, our Lady of Prompt Succor, Holy Angels, Angel Guardian, St. Joseph, St. Patrick, St. Bridget, St. Francis Xavier, St. Vincent de Paul, St. Alphonsus de Ligouri, &c., &c. No Prayer-Book in the language contains a greater number of Prayers, drawn from the works of Canonized Saints, and Ascetical writers, approved by the Church.

It is illustrated with fifteen fine engravings after Muller of Dusseldorf. Visitors to Dunigan & Brother will find a mass of useful gift-books at all prices.

Haverty, in Fulton street, has on hand, besides his own neat publications, a great variety of books—Irish, English, American, and French—many of which are quite suitable for gifts. Among his late importations from Ireland is, the Dublin University Magazine, complete to this year from the commencement. It embraces forty-six volumes—can be had for a couple of dollars a volume—and is a present certainly worth giving and receiving. Haverty has something to suit every taste. Our Musical friends can be supplied with the fine quarto edition of the Spirit of the Nation. Antiquarians will be delighted with that admirable work, the Dublin Penny Journal; and those who love the memories of Banim and other Irish Novelists, and delight in thought to revisit the Streets of Dublin can exercise their affections and longings over the pages of the plethoric tomes of the Irish Quarterly Review, of which Haverty has a complete set. Of the Celtic Union Publications, he has an assortment which includes A History of the Invasion of Ireland by the Normans, by G. H. Supple; Traces of the Crusaders in Ireland, by J. T. Campion, and Versicles, by Thomas Irwin. He will also send to those who desire, any one of the following volumes, by mail, on receipt of one dollar—Madden's Life of Emmet, Mitchel's Jail Journal, Meagher's Speeches, Savage's '98 and '48, Moore's Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Hayes' Irish Ballads, Barrington's Rise and Fall of the Irish Nation. These are in every variety of binding, and quite suitable for the season.

Our friends in Boston are well supplied at the stores of Donahoe, in Franklin street, and Hickey, corner of William and Federal streets. Mr. Donahoe is magnificently supplied with religious gift-books, such as attract attention in Dunigan's in this city. He has besides a large stock of publications issued by himself, such as Smith O'Brien's Meditations in Exile, the Life of Mary Queen of Scots, and others of an historical, instructive and theological nature. This is a season of congratulation, and as Irishmen, we feel peculiarly proud in congratulating Mr. Donahoe upon the success which has crowned his labors as a publisher, in one of the most fastidious and exacting cities of the Union.

All the best publications from New-York, including those enumerated, are to be had at Mr. William Hickey's, Federal street. He has also a large stock of the best theological works, issued by the Catholic writers of England and Ireland.

The tourist who has pleasant memories of the old land, may revivify them on the pictures and pages of Mrs. Hall's splendid work. The mourner over the fall of Ireland into a legislative connection with England, may find a sad pleasure by perusing the pages of Barrington, in which the eloquent men, who made the Irish history of the era, are with almost equal eloquence portrayed. The hopeful military aspirant may seek in O'Connor's History of the Irish Brigade that consolation which the cessation of the European war has denied him. For every mind, Mr. Hickey will find balm, delight and instruction. For this happy duty he is peculiarly qualified—never allowing the integrity of his nature to be warped by the temporary excitements of the hour, nor never lowering himself beneath the standard of those good works he distributes, and which preach the doctrine of toleration and Christian brotherhood. We trust he will need a fresh stock by this day week.

Literary and Artistic News.

An Etymological Dictionary of Family and Christian names, with an essay on their derivation and import, recently published, contains some interesting information. Byron's couplet on the Poems of Amos Cottle, is familiar:

"Oh Amos Cottle! Phœbus, what a name,
To fill the speaking trump of future fame!"

But the compiler of this work thinks the nerves of the poet would have been still more jarred at such names as that of Preserved Fish, a distinguished merchant of New-York, within our recollection; or of Wonderful Pike, a resident of Providence about half a century ago. During the period of the Commonwealth in England, everything was intensely puritanical. Few, save scriptural names, were then used, and many of them were of the quaintest description. Then came into use the names of Remembrance, Faith, Hope, Charity, Patience, Perseverance, Prudence, Mercy, Desire, Grace, for the gentler sex; while men were christened Hopestill, Waitstill, Exercise, Resolved, Increase, Thankful, Comfort, Contentment, Zealous, and the like corresponding class of names were then used for females, such as Deborah, Susanna, Rachel, Judith, Dorothy, Bathsheba, &c. Unusual Scriptural names too were introduced, such as Adad, Shadrack, Abednego, Epaphroditus, Abimeleck, Melchizedek, Jahaleck, etc. The practice of adding a third or middle name, now universal, came into use about a half a century since. That of changing sterling old family names into such distortions as Addie, Lottie, Lizzie, Jennie, etc., was original with the women of this generation, and is, as every one knows, immensely popular with them. Such names as Eva, Ida, Ada, Cora, Nina, etc., have been introduced, chiefly through the aid of modern writers of fiction. The custom of using sacred names is much more common in some Catholic countries than with us.

The Revue des Deux Mondes published some time ago a paper disclosing the pitiable style in which some literary works were concocted. A curious instance of this is adduced by a French paper. In every circulating library in France may be had on application a novel of a well-known author, in the middle of which two pages are wanting, the manuscript having been lost during the process of composition. The publisher had not the slightest notion of paying the author to fill up the blank, and the writer, on the other hand, was equally averse to oblige him gratis. In this incomplete state the book has gone through several editions. The amusing part of the story, however is, that the readers never perceive the existence of the lacuna, and on seeing the book on a recent occasion, the author was obliged to acknowledge to himself that the accidental omission was rather an improvement than otherwise. The London Critic reminds us of a story mentioned by a German critic, and related in the Blatter fur Literarische Unterhaltung. He had to write a review of a very popular novel. It was, like many fashionable English novels, in three volumes, and by a mistake of the binders, the title page of the first volume had been affixed to the third, and vice versa. As he was a man of orderly habits, he naturally began at what he considered the beginning, and thus went through the whole book more Hebraico. He never found out his mistake until one day, a conversation with the author set the matter right.

The Chicago Democratic Press of the 15th ult. announced the sudden death of Charles Boynton, editor of the Lasalle Press. Mr. Boynton was a young man, possessed of an energy of thought and action, a sound practical common-sense, and a fair literary taste, which rendered him not only a most valuable citizen, but also a useful editor. Situated in a region whose resources required to be developed and made known, he was highly instrumental in calling public attention to the mineral wealth that lies slumbering in the Lasalle basin. By his death, the coal-mining enterprise of Illinois loses an untiring advocate, Lasalle a most useful and valuable citizen, and the State an able editor.

Edward Everett indorses Colonel Benton's new work, in the following letter, dated Boston, December 20, 1856, and addressed to Mr. M. Turner:—"Dear sir: I have received your letter of yesterday, inviting me to become a subscriber for the proposed abridgment of the Debates in Congress from 1789 to 1856. I have already subscribed for it in this city. Colonel Benton's eminent talent and reputation as a statesman, his familiar acquaintance with our parliamentary history, and his untiring industry, are a sufficient guarantee for the faithful execution of this undertaking."

Keating's Ireland.

BROOKLYN, 27th Dec., 1856.

MY DEAR HAVERTY,

I regret to learn of those annoyances from your numerous correspondents to which the delay in issuing my translation of Dr. Keating's History has subjected you. As this delay has been entirely caused by me, and not in the slightest degree by you, I deem that I owe some explanation on the subject to your correspondents, and also to yourself, for you have much more reason to feel disappointed than they.

When about to commence the work, at the suggestion of my friends, I led both you and myself somewhat into error as to the time it would take me to complete its translation. This arose both from my ignorance of what is called "book-making," and from a wrong estimate formed by me as to the amount of actual labor to be done. As you may remember, I at that time proposed but to translate an Irish Mss. copy of the Foras Feasa, then in my possession, and to collate my translation of it with those already in existence, giving occasionally a note upon any obscurity or discrepancies I might meet therein. Had I confined myself to this intention, neither you nor the patrons of the work would have had cause to complain of any delay in its publication, and I would, perhaps, have been, myself, as well remunerated for one-third of my present labor.
